Article 3. Brokerage

1. As broker's activity shall be deemed the activity of making civil law transactions in securities and/or of making agreements which are derivative financial instruments on a client's instructions on behalf and at the expense of a client (in particular, of the issuer of serial securities when they are placed), in his own name and at a client's expense on the basis of commutative agreements made with a client.

A professional securities market-maker engaged in broker's activity shall be called a broker.

In the event of rendering by a broker of the services related to placement of serial securities, the broker shall be entitled to acquire at his own expense the securities which are not placed within the term provided for by a contract.

2. A broker shall follow his clients' instructions in good faith and in the order of their receipt. Transactions carried out on behalf of clients shall be subject in all cases to priority execution as compared with the dealer's operations of the broker, when he combines broker's and dealer's activities.

If a conflict of interests between a broker and his client of which the client had not been notified before the broker received the relevant order, has caused damage to the client, the broker shall be obliged to compensate for the losses in the order prescribed by the civil legislation of the Russian Federation.

2.1. If this is stipulated in a contract for the broker's servicing, the broker has the right to carry out transactions with securities and to sign contracts that are derivative financial instruments, while being at the same time a commercial representative of different parties to a transaction, including of those who are not businessmen.

2.2. Liabilities that have arisen from a contract concluded not at organised auctions, each of whose parties is a broker, are not terminated by the coincidence of debtor and creditor in one person, if the parties' liabilities are fulfilled at the expense of different clients or by the third persons in the interest of different clients. The broker has no right to conclude the above contract if it is signed in execution of a client's order not containing the price of the contract or the procedure for determining such. The consequence of carrying out a transaction with a violation of the demands established in this point is the imposition upon the broker of a liability to recompense the client's losses.

3. The clients' monetary assets transferred by them to the broker for making transactions in securities and/or making agreements which are derivative financial instruments, as well as the monetary assets received by the broker under such transactions and/or under such agreements which are made by the broker on the basis of agreements with clients, must be kept on a separate bank account (accounts) to be opened by the broker with a credit institution (a special broker's account). A broker shall be obliged to keep records of monetary assets of each client thereof kept on a special broker's account (accounts) and to report to his client therefor. There may not be levied execution related to a broker's liabilities against the monetary assets of his clients kept at a special broker's account (accounts). A broker shall not be entitled to enter his own monetary assets on a special broker's account, except for cases of their return to his client and/or granting a loan to his client in the procedure established by this Article.

A broker shall be entitled to use in his interests the monetary assets kept on a special broker's account (accounts), where it is provided for by a broker's service contract, guaranteeing the client that he will follow his instructions at the expense of the said monetary assets or will return them upon the request of the client. The monetary assets of the clients that have entitled a broker to use them in their interests have to be kept on a special broker's account (accounts) separate from the special broker's account (accounts) where monetary assets of the clients that have not entitled the broker to do this are kept. The monetary assets of the clients that have entitled a broker to use them may be entered by the broker to his own bank account.

The requirements of this Item shall not extend to credit organisations.

4. A broker shall be entitled to lend monetary assets and/or securities to his client for making purchase and sale transactions in securities on condition of the client's providing security in the way stipulated by this Item. Transactions made with the use of the monetary assets and/or securities lent by a broker shall be called marginal transactions.

The terms and conditions of a loan agreement, including the amount of the loan or a procedure for determining it, may be specified by a broker's service contract. With this, as a document to certify lending a certain amount of money or a certain number of securities shall be recognised a broker's report on marginal transactions made, or other document determined by a contract's terms and conditions.

A broker shall be entitled to recover interest on the loans granted to a client. As security for a client's liabilities related to granted loans, a broker shall only be entitled to accept the securities owned by the client and/ or acquired by the broker for the client within the framework of marginal transactions.

The amount of security provided by a client shall be determined by a broker on the basis of the market value of the securities serving as security that has been formed at organised auctions, less the reduction established by the contract. The securities serving as security of a client's liabilities related to the loans granted by a broker shall be subject to revaluation.

In cases when the sum of a loan and (or) of borrowed securities is not returned on time, when an interest on a granted loan is not paid up at the fixed date, as well as if the amount of the provision will become less than the sum of the loan granted to the client (of the market cost of borrowed securities that has formed at organised auctions), the broker shall turn an exaction upon the monetary funds and (or) securities which are the client's provision for the loans granted by the broker, in an out-of-court procedure by way of realising such securities at organised auctions.

As security for a client's liabilities related to loans granted by a broker, there may be only accepted the liquid securities included in the quotation list of the exchange. The liquidity criteria of the said securities, the minimum amount of the reduction, the procedure for determining the market value of the securities accepted by a broker as security, the procedure and terms for revaluation thereof, as well as the requirements to the time, procedure and conditions of selling the securities that serve as security for a client's liabilities related to the loans granted by the broker shall be established by regulatory acts of the Bank of Russia.

5. A broker shall be only entitled to acquire the securities intended for qualified investors and to make agreements which are the derivative financial instruments intended for qualified investors, if the client, at whose expense such transaction (such agreement) is made, is a qualified investor in compliance with Item 2 of Article 51.2 of this Federal Law (hereinafter referred to as qualified investors by virtue of federal law) or is recognised by this broker as a qualified investor in compliance with this Federal Law. With this, a security or a derivative financial instrument shall be deemed intended for qualified investors, if under regulatory acts of the Bank of Russia transactions in such securities (agreements which are such derivative financial instruments) may be only made by qualified investors or at the expense of qualified investors. Qualified investors by virtue of federal laws and persons recognized as qualified investors in compliance with this Federal Law shall be named qualified investors.

6. As effects of making by a broker transactions in securities and agreements which are derivative financial instruments in defiance of the requirements of Item 5 of this article, in particular as a result of wrongful recognition of a client as a qualified investor, shall be deemed the following:

- 1) imposition upon the broker of the duty of acquiring at his own expense from a client securities by the client's request and of compensating to the client all the expenses made in making the cited transactions, including the expenses involving payment for the services of the broker, depository and exchange;
- 2) imposition upon the broker of the duty to compensate to a client the losses caused in connection with making and executing the agreements which are derivative financial instruments, including all the expenses made by the client when making the cited transactions, in particular the outlays involving payment for the services of the broker and an exchange.

7. Where it is provided for by Subitem 1 of Item 6 of this Article, securities shall be purchased at the highest of the following prices: the acquisition price of this security or market price thereof as of the date when a client made the claim provided for by Subitem 1 of Item 6 of this Article.

8. A claim for application of the effects provided for by Item 6 of this Article may be made by a client within one year as of the date when it received the appropriate broker's report on conducted transactions.

The manager shall only be entitled when exercising the activity of securities' management to acquire the securities intended for qualified investors and to make agreements which are derivative financial instruments intended for qualified investors on condition that a client is a qualified investor.
