Background

Match-fixing is a "new challenge" to Council of Europe Ministerial Conference in Athens in 2008. Moreover, it is perceived as a threat to the democratic governance of sport, to the rule of law and public order. The Council of Europe has played a pioneer role throughout the years in developing human rights and building a democratic culture through sport. An intergovernmental pan-European partnership has provided a series of conventions and charters with standard-setting, monitoring and technical assistance, as well as co-ordinated positions with other international organisations (UNESCO or WADA), and sport movement bodies (FIFA, IOC or UEFA).

The Enlarged Partial Agreement on Sport (EPAS) was established in 2007 to address the current challenges facing sport in Europe. EPAS serves as a platform between the public authorities of 33 member states, fostering dialogue among ministries, sports federations and NGOs, ensuring conformity to ethical and positive values.

The European Convention on Spectator Violence has been prepared in the aftermath of the Heysel tragedy in Brussels (May 1985), aiming at tackling hooliganism in Europe. It commits 41 States parties to take practical measures to prevent and control violence, as well as ensure safety of spectators at sports events. The Convention sets out methods for identifying and prosecuting offenders, relying on police co-operation and information exchange.
