REPORT TO THE COMMITTEE OF MINISTERS

I. INTRODUCTION

1. The Consultative Council of European Judges (CCJE) held its 5th meeting from 22 to 24 November 2004 at Council of Europe headquarters in Strasbourg, with Mr Alain LACABARATS (France) in the chair. The list of participants is set out in Appendix I to this report and the agenda in Appendix II.

2. The CCJE's main task is to prepare opinions for the Committee of Ministers on general questions concerning the independence, impartiality and competence of judges, and to contribute to the implementation of the framework global action plan for judges in Europe adopted by the Committee of Ministers at its 740th meeting (7 February 2001).

3. In accordance with its terms of reference and pursuant to the decision taken at its 4th meeting (see CCJE (2003) 43, part VII, A), the CCJE adopted, for the attention of the Committee of Ministers Opinion No.6 (2004) on fair trial within a reasonable time and the role of judges in proceedings, taking into account alternative means of dispute settlement. The text of Opinion No.6 (2004) is set out in Appendix IV to this report (see also part II below).

4. The CCJE took note of:

a) the adoption of the revised specific terms of reference of the CCJE for 2004-2005 by the Committee of Ministers at its 876th meeting (17 March 2004), as set out in Appendix III to this report;

b) the invitation from the Polish National Council of Justice to hold the next meeting of its working party in Katowice (Poland), after the 2nd European Conference of Judges (see part IV below);

c) the hearing given to the Chair of the CCJE by the Committee of Ministers (see part VI below);

d) the exchange of views held by the CCJE-GT with the members of the Italian Judicial Service Commission and Italian judges on case management, at a joint working session held on 12 July 2004 (see part VII (a) below);

e) the proceedings of the 1st European Conference of Judges, held in Strasbourg on 24 and 25 November 2003, on "The early settlement of disputes and the role of judges » see doc.CONF/JUGES (2003) PROCEEDINGS);

f) the discussion held by the Chair of the CCJE with the European Commission for the Efficiency of Justice (CEPEJ); the CCJE agreed on the arrangements for co-operation with the CEPEJ (see parts V (b) and VII (c) below);

5. The CCJE welcomed the contacts established with the European Network of Councils for the Judiciary (ENCJ) (see part VII (b) below).

6. The explanatory memorandum and questionnaire on the theme “Justice and society”, as approved by the CCJE, is set out in Appendix V to this report (see also part III below).

7. The memorandum on the 2nd European Conference of Judges, containing the draft programme as approved by the CCJE, is set out in Appendix VI to this report (see also part IV below).

8. Mr Alain LACABARATS (France) was re-elected Chair, and Mr Raffaele SABATO (Italy) was re-elected Vice-Chair of the CCJE as from 1 January 2005 (see part VIII (c) below).

II. ADOPTION OF OPINION NO.6 (2004)

9. Having taken into account of delegations' written and oral observations and the comments submitted by Mr Carlos GOMEZ, CCJE specialist, the CCJE amended the draft text drawn up by the CCJE-GT and unanimously adopted Opinion No.6 (2004) on fair trial within a reasonable time and the role of judges in proceedings, taking into account alternative means of dispute settlement.

10. In accordance with its terms of reference, the CCJE forwarded Opinion No.6 (2004), as set out in Appendix IV to this report, to the Committee of Ministers.

11. The CCJE invited the Committee of Ministers to note that it had forwarded Opinion No.6 (2004) to the CDCJ, CDPC and CDDH, so that they could consider any appropriate further action, especially of a standard-setting nature, and to the CEPEJ, so that it could be taken into account in its future work.

12. Having completed its work on Opinion No.6 (2004), the CCJE thanked all those who had participated in preparing the text for their valuable input; it thanked in particular its specialists, Mr Carlos GOMEZ and Mr Justice PITCHERS, for the very useful reports and information they had provided

III. PREPARATION OF THE OPINION ON “JUSTICE AND SOCIETY”

13. As required by its terms of reference, the CCJE would prepare an Opinion in 2005 on the theme "Justice and society", which appeared in the framework global action plan for judges in Europe (see doc.CCJE (2001) 24, item V).

14. The CCJE felt that the 2nd European Conference of Judges, whose theme was closely linked to that of the Opinion (see part IV (b) below), would make a significant contribution to its work.

15. In view of the complexity of the subject, the CCJE thought it essential to have the help of two specialists: a judge and a journalist specialising in justice-related issues. It asked the Council of Europe to make available the necessary budgetary resources for the preparation of an opinion taking into account the views of both judges and the media. The CCJE specialists could participate in the 2nd European Conference of Judges (see part IV (b) below) as rapporteurs.

16. With a view to the preparation of this Opinion, the Chair of the CJ-DA-GT had produced a document containing an explanatory memorandum and questionnaire. The CCJE examined and approved this document subject to the introduction of a few amendments decided on at the meeting. As far as possible, the document would first be forwarded to the specialists and then sent to the CCJE delegations. Replies to the questionnaire should reach the Secretariat no later than 31 January 2005. The document containing an explanatory memorandum and a questionnaire on the theme "Justice and society" is set out in Appendix V to this report.

17. The CCJE delegations stressed that the Opinion on this topic should highlight the absolutely essential need for co-operation between courts and lawyers.

18. On the basis of the replies to the questionnaire, the specialists would be invited to prepare their reports, which would be forwarded to the CCJE's working party. At its first meeting the working party would draw up an explanatory document, and a sub-working party would prepare a draft Opinion with the Secretariat, due account also being taken of the results of the 2nd European Conference of Judges. The draft Opinion would be discussed and finalised at the second meeting of the CCJE-GT and submitted to the CCJE for adoption at its meeting in 2005.

19. Delegations wishing to make written comments were asked to e-mail them to the Secretariat in good time.

20. In accordance with the terms of reference, the Opinion on "Justice and society" would then be submitted to the Committee of Ministers.

21. The CCJE would also send this Opinion to the CDCJ, the CDPC and the CDDH for consideration of any appropriate further action, especially of a standard-setting nature, and to the CEPEJ for information.

IV. EUROPEAN CONFERENCES OF JUDGES

a) 1st European Conference of Judges

22. The CCJE noted with satisfaction that the 1st European Conference of Judges, held in Strasbourg on 24-25 November 2003 on the theme "Early settlement of disputes and the role of judges", had been followed by a proposal from Ms Louise OTIS, a Quebec judge who had made a statement at the conference, to hold a training session on mediation in Montreal in autumn 2005. This session was aimed at the 25 European judges. It would be organised by the Secretariat as part of the Council of Europe's co-operation programmes for the strengthening of the rule of law. The CCJE would be informed about the holding of this session.

b) 2nd European Conference of Judges

23. The CCJE considered that the experience of holding the 1st European Conference of Judges in Strasbourg on 24 and 25 November 2003 on the theme "Early settlement of disputes and the role of judges" had demonstrated the importance of such events both for the work of the CCJE and for the judiciary as a whole.

24. It therefore welcomed the possibility (subject to budget availability) of holding a second conference in Cracow (Poland) in 2005 during the Polish Chairmanship of the Committee of Ministers, and hoped that the 3rd Summit of Heads of State and Government marking the end of the Polish Chairmanship would take into consideration the results of this conference.

25. The CCJE stressed that the theme chosen for the conference – the relations between the justice system and the media – was closely linked to the theme of its next Opinion. The results of the conference would therefore have to be taken into consideration in preparing that Opinion.

26. The CCJE considered that, in order to establish constructive dialogue on a theme that was of great interest to both sectors, it should be possible not only for judges but also for media representatives to participate in the conference. It thought that the latter should be involved as rapporteurs, given that the conference would be open to all those with a professional interest in the subject.

27. The CCJE delegations examined the draft programme prepared by the Secretariat according to the instructions of the CCJE-GT (see doc.CCJE-GT(2004)6 rev). They asked the Secretariat to amend the draft programme in the light of the discussions. They noted that the first President of the Supreme Court of Poland wished to address the conference on the following subject: "The judge and the media – the journalist in court: the image of justice in society". The revised draft programme of the 2nd European Conference of Judges is set out in Appendix VI to this report.

28. The CCJE thought that the conference should be widely publicised, particularly via the Internet, so that all interested persons would have sufficient time to take the necessary steps to participate in this event. It hoped that arrangements would be made by the Council of Europe to ensure the widest possible attendance. It asked the Council of Europe to publish the proceedings of the conference.

29. The CCJE welcomed the invitation from the Polish delegation to hold the eighth meeting of its working party in Poland, after the conference. This meeting could be held, subject to authorisation from the Committee of Ministers, in Katowice, at the headquarters of the district court.

V. CONTRIBUTION AS FROM 2006 TO IMPLEMENTATION OF THE FRAMEWORK GLOBAL ACTION PLAN FOR JUDGES IN EUROPE

a) Preparation of draft terms of reference of the CCJE for 2006-2007

30. The CCJE confirmed its desire to play an active part in implementation of the framework global action plan for judges in Europe and felt that its work could also help states to fulfil their obligations under Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

31. It instructed its working party to prepare draft terms of reference for the CCJE for 2006 and 2007. The draft terms of reference would be discussed at the next meeting of the CCJE in 2005, with a view to their submission to the Committee of Ministers for adoption.

b) Other work

32. The CCJE urged its members to make the Opinions known in the member states and distribute them widely in the national language. It also invited the delegations of those states where French and English were not official languages to send the Secretariat the national language versions of the Opinions and to report to the CCJE, at its next meeting, on the steps taken to make them known in their countries. The Secretariat would publish these language versions on the Council of Europe's Internet site.

33. Those CCJE delegations which had been called upon by various organisations or authorities to comment on the issues addressed by the CCJE in its work were asked to make this known to the Secretariat, which would draw up a list of these contributions. This list would be regularly updated.

34. Some delegations suggested introducing a way of monitoring the application of the Opinions in the member states. Analysis of national situations would make it possible to identify shortcomings in the member states' judicial systems and provide information on these to the Committee of Ministers.

35. The CCJE was ready to provide practical assistance to help states to comply with the standards relating to judges, in particular those set out in its Opinions. It specifically intended to study good practices which might be brought to the attention of all member states.

36. It confirmed its readiness to advise the steering committees on the appropriateness of updating the Council of Europe's legal instruments relating to the judiciary, and the manner of so doing, and to co-operate with the Venice Commission on constitutional issues of relevance to the judiciary.

37. The CCJE was willing to prepare texts or opinions at the request of the Committee of Ministers or other Council of Europe bodies. It therefore confirmed its readiness to prepare an opinion, at the request of the CEPEJ, on its framework programme: "A new objective for judicial systems: the processing of each case within an optimum and foreseeable time frame" (see doc.CEPEJ (2004) 19 rev.1). It instructed its working party to draw up this opinion and to forward it to the CEPEJ.

38. The CCJE confirmed that the development of partnerships in the judicial sphere between courts, judges and associations of judges should be encouraged. The delegations would inform the Secretariat of possibilities in this area, specifying in particular which national organisations were willing to participate in such a project and on what terms.

VI. HEARING BY THE COMMITTEE OF MINISTERS

39. The CCJE thanked the Ministers' Deputies for having heard a statement by its Chair on the past and future work of the CCJE at its 880th meeting (Strasbourg, 7 April 2004) and stressed the importance of the subsequent exchange of views, which would be very useful for the pursuit of its activities.

40. It noted with satisfaction that, following the presentation of the CCJE's work in 2003 and the projects currently in progress, the Chairman of the Ministers' Deputies had congratulated the CCJE on the judicious choice of topics for its Opinions and the efficiency shown in carrying out its terms of reference, and had confirmed the interest of the Ministers' Deputies in granting regular hearings to the Chair of the CCJE. The Ministers' Deputies has also emphasised the CCJE's central role in consolidating the rule of law in Europe and, in particular, the importance of the Opinion on the training of judges for member states' national policies in this area.

41. The CCJE welcomed the backing given by the Ministers' Deputies to the regular holding of European Conferences of Judges and their full support for the choice of the theme of the next conference, "Justice and the media", which they considered particularly relevant in present-day society.

42. The CCJE therefore expressed the wish that its Chair be given a hearing by the Committee of Ministers in 2005. Subject to an invitation from the Ministers' Deputies, this hearing could be held on 29 June 2005.

VII. CO-OPERATION WITH OTHER BODIES

a) Italian Judicial Service Commission

43. The CCJE welcomed the invitation issued to its working party by the Italian Judicial Service Commission (CSM) to hold a joint working session on case management (Rome, 12 July 2004). It stressed that this proposal to involve the CCJE directly in the national debate on possible improvements to the justice system was fully in line with the CCJE's terms of reference, under which it was required, inter alia, to provide "practical assistance to enable states to comply with Council of Europe standards concerning judges".

44. The CCJE greatly appreciated this exchange of views and considered that its results had made a significant contribution to the substance of the opinion on fair trial within a reasonable time and role of judges in proceedings, taking into account alternative means of dispute settlement. It thanked the Italian authorities for their faith in the expertise of the CCJE. The report of this meeting is set out in document CCJE-GT(2004)11, part V.

b) European Network of Councils for the Judiciary (ENCJ)

45. The CCJE took note of the exchange of views which the Chair, Vice-Chair and former Chair of the CCJE and the secretary of the CCJE had held with Mr Luigi BERLINGUER, Chair of the 6th Committee of the Italian CSM and President of the recently established European Network of Councils for the Judiciary, on the occasion of a working session on case management with Italian judges and the members of the 6th Committee of the CSM (Rome, 12 July 2004). It welcomed the ENCJ's interest in establishing co-operative relations with the CCJE.

46. It also took note of the discussion which the Secretariats of the CCJE and the CEPEJ had held with representatives of the ENCJ, including Mr BERLINGUER, during a working meeting to consider the arrangements for co-operation between the network and the Council of Europe (Strasbourg, 4 October 2004).

47. It thanked Ms Edith VAN DEN BROECK, ENCJ representative, for the information she had provided on the network's origins, structure and aims and said that co-operation between the CCJE and the network would be welcome.

48. Speaking on behalf of the ENCJ, Ms VAN DEN BROECK asked to be sent copies of the documents prepared by the CCJE, to be involved in the preparation of Opinions, to be invited to conferences and other events organised under CCJE auspices, to participate in the appointment of national representatives for the CCJE and to be granted observer status with the CCJE.

49. The CCJE observed that the ENCJ could not be granted observer status because it was not an official body. However, co-operation between the two bodies might initially involve forwarding the CCJE's opinions to the ENCJ, inviting the latter to the 2nd European Conference of Judges and to the meetings of the CCJE, and consulting the ENCJ on any questions falling within its sphere of competence which were to be dealt with under the CCJE's terms of reference.

50. It was suggested that the 3rd European Conference of Judges be devoted to the role of councils for the judiciary in states governed by the rule of law. The conference could be organised in close co-operation with the ENCJ.

c) European Commission for the Efficiency of Justice (CEPEJ)

51. The CCJE took note of its Chair's exchange of views with the Bureau of the CEPEJ (Strasbourg, 20 October 2004) and agreed the arrangements for co-operation between the CCJE and the CEPEJ, involving, in particular, mutual invitations to meetings and exchanges of documents. It was pleased to note the progress made in the development of relations between the two bodies.

VIII. OTHER BUSINESS

a. Visibility of the CCJE on the Council of Europe's Internet site

52. The CCJE observed that access to its Internet site was difficult because those interested had to click on several links in order to reach it. Having a specific role in relation to courts in Europe, as provided for under its terms of reference, the CCJE noted that the location of its site was an obstacle to achieving the desired results. It therefore asked the Secretariat to take the necessary steps to improve its site, and in particular to facilitate access both to working papers and to the relevant Council of Europe instruments and documents and to give it a higher profile.

b. Agenda of the next CCJE meeting

53. The CCJE agreed on the following agenda for its next meeting:

- Preparation of the Opinion for the attention of the Committee of Ministers on "Justice and society"
- Preparation of draft terms of reference for the CCJE for 2006 and 2007;
- Exchange of views on follow-up to the 2nd European Conference of Judges;

- Exchange of views on the draft questionnaires to be prepared by the Chair of the working party on topics to be dealt with in 2006 and 2007;
- Exchange of views on practical assistance for states in judicial matters;
- Exchange of views on partnership in the judicial sphere;
- Election of the Chair and Vice-Chair of the CCJE.

c. Election of the Chair and Vice-Chair of the CCJE

54. Mr Alain LACABARATS (France) and Mr Raffaele SABATO (Italy) were unanimously re-elected Chair and Vice-Chair of the CCJE.

d. CCJE working party

55. In accordance with its terms of reference, the CCJE appointed its working party (CCJE-GT) with the following composition: Mr Raffaele SABATO, Chair (Italy), and 11 members: Mr Gerhard REISSNER (Austria), Mr Stelios NATHANAEL (Cyprus), Mr Robert FREMR (Czech Republic), Mr Alain LACABARATS (France), Mr Jean-Claude WIWINIUS (Luxembourg), Ms Will TONKENS-GERKEMA (Netherlands), Mr Nils A. ENGSTAD (Norway), Ms Irena PIOTROWSKA (Poland), Mr Orlando AFONSO (Portugal), Ms Aneta ARNAUDOVSKA ("the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia" and the Right Honourable Lord Justice MANCE (United Kingdom).

56. Mr Virgilijus VALANČIUS (Lithuania) was the substitute member of the CCJE-GT.

e. Dates of next meetings

57. The CCJE noted that its next plenary meeting would be held in Strasbourg from 23 to 25 November 2005. The 8th meeting of the working party would be held in Kartowice (Poland) from 27 to 29 April, subject to the authorisation of the Committee of Ministers, and its 9th meeting in Strasbourg from 29 June to 1 July 2005.

SUMMARY OF THE RECOMMENDATIONS AND CONCLUSIONS

APPENDIX

INTRODUCTION

1. Over the years, management of proceedings by the courts in Europe has been evolving towards fuller consideration of the interests of court users. Practitioners have directed attention to ways of meeting the public's expectations that all who seek justice should not only have readier access to the courts but also benefit from enhanced effectiveness of the procedures applied and more reliable guarantees that rulings delivered will be enforced.
2. The essential instrument of this evolution is the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights (the Court) being consulted in order to interpret and apply its provisions.
3. Article 6 of the ECHR in particular has generated a fund of procedural law common to the different European states and brought into being general principles which, above and beyond the wealth and diversity of the national systems, are intended to secure the right of access to a court, the right to obtain a decision within a reasonable time at the end of a fair and equitable procedure, and the right to obtain enforcement of any judgment delivered.
4. The right to a fair trial is tending to become a true substantive right for the citizens of Europe, one whose enforcement is ensured by the Court and subsequently the domestic courts, for example by compensating litigants whose cases are not tried within a reasonable time.
5. For a number of years the Council of Europe has shown a constant concern to improve the public's access to justice, as reflected in its various Resolutions and Recommendations on legal aid, the simplification of procedures, reducing the costs of proceedings, the use of new technologies, reducing the courts' workload and alternative means of settling disputes.
6. The Court itself ensures that governments abide by the provisions of Article 6 of the ECHR, for example by reminding them, that any person wishing to bring legal proceedings must have access to a court, and that no state interference with this prerogative, whether in fact or in law, is permissible.
7. The Consultative Council of European Judges (CCJE) has given thought to how judges might participate in this effort to guarantee access to rapid and effective settlement of disputes.
8. It recalls that the 1st European Conference of Judges on "Early settlement of disputes and the role of judges", held at the Council of Europe on 24 and 25 November 2003, revealed that no matter how interesting and useful alternative measures such as mediation or conciliation may be, confidence in the judicial institution remains an essential feature of democratic societies.
9. It is therefore important that, when dealing with the justice system, citizens should know that they are dealing with an efficient institution.
10. In this context, this Opinion revolves around (A) the question of access to justice (B) the quality of the justice system and its assessment, quantitative statistical data, monitoring procedures (C) the courts' workload and case management and (D) alternative dispute resolution with the emphasis on the judge's role in the implementation of the principles laid down in the ECHR and the case-law of the Court.

A. ACCESS TO JUSTICE

11. Public access to justice presupposes delivery of suitable information on the functioning of the judicial system.

12. The CCJE considers that all moves to provide the public with such information are to be encouraged.

13. The public should in particular be made aware of the nature of proceedings which may be brought, their possible duration, their cost and the risks involved in case of wrongful use of legal channels. Information should also be provided concerning alternative means of settling disputes which may be offered to parties.

14. This general information to the public can be supplemented by more precise information concerning in particular some of the landmark decisions delivered by the courts and how long it takes for cases to be dealt with in the various courts.

15. Information on the functioning of the judicial system can originate from various sources, such as the Justice Department (publication of information booklets, websites, etc.), the welfare services and the public legal advice services organised by lawyers' associations as well as other sources.

16. The courts themselves should participate in disseminating the information, particularly when they have public relations services. Amongst the relevant ways of disseminating information are the Internet sites run by certain courts.

17. The CCJE recommends the development of education programmes including a description of the judicial system and offering visits to courts. It also perceives a need to publish citizens' guides enabling potential litigants to gain a better grasp of the functioning of the judicial institutions, while also informing them of their procedural rights before the courts. Lastly, it recommends the general use of computer technology in order to provide members of the public with the same type of information on the functioning of the courts, the means of access to justice, the principal decisions delivered, and the statistical results of the courts.

18. The CCJE positively encourages the adoption of a simplified and standardised format for the legal documents needed to initiate and proceed with court actions. The recommended simplification is particularly advisable for minor litigation, for disputes involving consumers, and for cases in which the determination of the points of law and of fact raises virtually no difficulties (settlement of debts). It further recommends developing the technology whereby litigants may obtain, via computer facilities, the necessary documents for bringing an action before a court and either they or their representatives may be put directly in touch with the courts.

19. The CCJE also recommends that litigants be fully informed, by lawyers and courts or tribunals, even before proceedings are instituted, as to the nature and the amount of the costs they will have to bear, and that they be given an indication of the foreseeable duration of the proceedings up to the judgment.

20. In its Opinion No. 2 (2001), paragraph 9, the CCJE identified the importance of adequate funding to the operation of any judicial system. The question arises how far litigants, or others before court, can or should be expected to contribute to such funding through court fees. The CCJE considers that the judicial system should not obstruct access to justice through excessive costs. An efficient system of justice is of benefit to the public at large, not merely to those who also happen to become involved in litigation. The rule of law is demonstrated and established by the courts' efficient operation and judgments; and this enables the public at large to regulate and conduct its affairs securely and with confidence.

21. A legal aid system should be organised by the State to enable everyone to enjoy access to justice. Such aid should cover not only court costs but also legal advice as to the wisdom or the necessity of bringing an action. It should not be reserved for the neediest persons but should also be available, at least in part, to those whose average income does not enable them to bear the cost of an action unaided.

22. This system of partial legal aid allows the number of beneficiaries to be increased while preserving a certain balance between the authorities' obligation to facilitate access to justice, and individual responsibility. The CCJE considers that a judge or another authority acting judicially, should be able to take part in decisions concerning the grant of aid. If the authority required to rule on an application for legal aid is obliged to refuse it where the contemplated action appears manifestly inadmissible or ill-founded, it is indispensable, should action be brought by a litigant who has been refused aid, that the judge involved in the relevant decision should refrain from trying the case, for the sake of compliance with the duty of objective impartiality according to Article 6 of the ECHR.

23. The CCJE considers that legal aid should be financed by a public authority and covered by a special budget so that the corresponding expenses are not charged to the operating budget of the courts.

24. The provision of legal assistance to the parties is an important component of access to justice for litigants.

25. The CCJE notes, that in certain States, the intervention of a lawyer during the proceedings is not necessary. Other States draw distinctions according to the magnitude of the financial interests and the type of dispute or proceedings. The right for a litigant to plead his or her case before a court either personally or through the representative of his or her choice appears particularly suited to simplified proceedings, litigation of minor financial importance, and cases involving consumers.

26. Nonetheless, even in cases where there is no need to engage a lawyer at the outset, the CCJE considers that there should be provision enabling the judge, as an exceptional measure, to order the intervention of counsel if the case presents particular problems or if there is a major risk that the rights of the defence will be infringed. In that event, representation by a lawyer should have the support of an effective legal aid system.

27. Resolution (78) 8¹ states in paragraph 1 of the appendix that “no one should be prevented by economic obstacles from pursuing or defending his rights (...)”.

28. One must nonetheless guard against having the remuneration of lawyers and court officers fixed in such a way as to encourage needless procedural steps. Provision must also be made, pursuant to Recommendation No. R (84) 5² (principle 2-1 in the appendix), for sanctioning abuse of court procedure.

29. Legal aid is not the sole means of assisting access to justice. Other methods which can be used for this purpose include for instance an insurance for court costs, covering a party's own court costs and/or any sum payable to the other party where the case is lost.

30. The CCJE does not intend to discuss in detail, in this Opinion, a number of other arrangements for access to justice, including the conditional fees arrangement or the fixed expenses arrangement.

B. QUALITY OF THE JUSTICE SYSTEM AND ITS ASSESSMENT; QUANTITATIVE STATISTICAL DATA; MONITORING PROCEDURES

31. The provision of justice involves not only the work of judges and other legal professionals; it encompasses a number of activities performed within judicial institutions by governmental agents and private citizens; its operation heavily relies on judicial infra-structures (buildings, equipment, support staff, etc). Therefore, quality of the justice system depends both on the quality of infra-structures, which may be measured with criteria similar to those employed for other public services, and on the ability of legal professionals (judges, but also lawyers, prosecutors and clerks); even today it is possible to measure the work of such professionals against the benchmarks of law and of judicial or professional practice and deontology.

32. However, since the growing demand for justice in most countries are faced with limitations of the budget for the justice system, theory and practice suggest the possibility to assess the quality of judicial activity, with reference also to social and economic efficiency, through criteria that are sometimes similar to those employed for other public services.

33. The CCJE notes that a number of problems arise when applying to justice assessment criteria that do not take into account its specificities. Although similar considerations may apply to the activities of other legal professionals, the CCJE discussed the implications of such an approach to judicial activity.

34. The CCJE strongly emphasises, first of all, that the evaluation of "quality" of the justice system, i.e. of the performance of the court system as a whole or of each individual court or local group of courts, should not be confused with the evaluation of the professional ability of every single judge. Professional evaluation of judges, especially when aiming at decisions influencing their status or career, is a task that has other purposes and should be performed on the basis of objective criteria with all guarantees for judicial independence (see Opinion No. 1 (2001) of the CCJE, especially paragraph 45).

² Recommendation No R (84) 5 of the Committee of Ministers to member States on the principles of civil procedure designed to improve the functioning of justice.

35. The practice of some countries shows an overlap which the CCJE deems inappropriate, between quality assessment of justice and professional evaluation of a judge. This overlap is reflected in the way in which statistics are collected. In some countries statistics are kept for each individual judge, in the others the figures are for each court. All are likely to keep records of the number of cases dealt with, but the former system attaches that figure to individuals. Systems which assess judges statistically typically include a figure for the percentage of successful appeals.

36. Some countries consider the percentage of the decisions reversed on appeal as an indicator. An objective evaluation of the quality of judicial decisions may be one of the elements relevant for the professional assessment of a single judge, (but even in this context one should take into account the principle of judicial internal independence and the fact that reversal of decisions must be accepted as a normal outcome of appeal procedures, without any fault on the part of the first judge). However, the use of reversal rates as the only or even necessarily an important indicator to assess the quality of the judicial activity seems inappropriate to the CCJE. Among several aspects that could be discussed with reference to this problem, the CCJE underlines that it is a feature of the justice system based on "procedures", that the quality of the outcome of a single case depends heavily on the quality of the previous procedural steps (initiated by the police, public prosecution, private lawyers or parties), so that evaluation of judicial performance is impossible without evaluation of each single procedural context.

37. The same considerations apply to other systems in which some assessment, through systems different from the observation of the reversal rate, is possible as to an individual decision taken by judges.

38. In some countries, assessment of quality of justice is done through collection of indicators measuring the performance of the court: how long it takes to deal with cases, how great the backlog is, how large the support staff is, the quantity and quality of infra-structures (with special reference to buildings and information technology), etc.

39. This approach is in principle acceptable, as it tends to evaluate "performance" of justice in a wider sense. However, the better approach, in the opinion of the CCJE, would be to evaluate justice in its even wider context, i.e. in the interactions of justice with other variables (judges and lawyers, justice and police, case law and legislation, etc.), as most malfunctions of the justice system derive from lack of coordination between several actors. The CCJE considers that it is also crucial to underline the interaction between the quality of justice and the presence of adequate infra-structures and support personnel.

40. Even if modern information technology allows very sophisticated data to be collected, the difficulty remains as to what variables should be measured and how and by whom the results should be interpreted.

41. As to data to be collected, no generally accepted criteria exist at this moment. This is due to the fact that administration of justice differs greatly from the purely administrative tasks that are typical of other public services, where measurement through indicators has developed and may be effective. For example, the fact that one court takes longer on average than another to deal with a case or has a greater backlog of cases may or may not mean that this court is less efficient.

42. Whatever may be the developments in this field, the CCJE considers that "quality" of justice should not be understood as a synonym for mere "productivity" of the judicial system; a qualitative approach should address rather the ability of the system to match the demand of justice in conformity with the general goals of the legal system, of which speed of procedures is only one element.

43. The CCJE recommends that, as it is impossible at the moment to rely upon widely accepted criteria, quality indicators should at least be chosen by wide consensus among legal professionals, it being advisable that the independent body for the self-governing of the judiciary play a central role in the choice and the collection of "quality" data, in the design of the data collection procedure, in the evaluation of results, in its dissemination as feed-back to the individual actors on a confidential basis, as well as to the general public; such involvement may reconcile the need for a quality evaluation to be carried out with the need for indicators and evaluators to be respectful of judicial independence.

44. Usually statistical data are collected by courts and sent to a central authority that may be the Supreme Court, the High Council for the Judiciary, the Ministry of Justice or the National Court Administration. In daily data collection court registrars may play an important role. In some cases private agencies have participated in the identification of quality indicators and in the design of a quality control system.

45. The publication of statistical data concerning pending and past cases in each court, available in some States, is a further step towards transparency of the situation of workloads. Appropriate forms should be studied for the release of even reserved information to researchers and to the judiciary, in order to allow improvements of the system.

46. The centralised authority that gathers the data only sometimes performs a constant monitoring process. This monitoring does not always have, however, a direct and immediate impact on the organisation of the courts or allocation of human and material resources.

47. The CCJE believes that it is in the interest of the judiciary that data collection and monitoring be performed on a regular basis, and that appropriate procedures allow a ready adjustment of the organisation of courts to changes in the caseloads.³ In order to reconcile the realisation of this need with the guarantees of independence of the judiciary (namely, with the principle of irremovability of the judge and the prohibition of removal of cases from a judge), it seems advisable to the CCJE that the authority competent for data collection and monitoring should be the independent body mentioned in paragraphs 37 and 45 of its Opinion No. 1 (2001); if another body is competent for data collection and monitoring, the states should assure that such activities remain within the public sphere in order to preserve the relevant policy interests linked with the data treatment concerning justice; the independent body should however have power to take measures necessary to adjust the court organisation to the change in caseloads.

48. Smooth co-operation should take place among all actors as to interpretation and dissemination of data.

C. CASELOAD AND CASE MANAGEMENT

³ See part C, letter b.

49. This section covers measures that may reduce the workload of courts as well as measures to assist the handling of cases coming to court. The CCJE takes these subjects together⁴ because both are of importance to the performance by courts of their duty to provide a fair trial within a reasonable time and there is a certain overlap.

I. GENERAL

50. Measures reducing the workload of courts included measures which have that object alone and measures that have an independent value. Recommendation No. R (86) 12 identifies measures applying to varying extents to criminal and civil courts⁵. Recommendations No. R (87) 18⁶ and No. R (95) 12⁷ deal specifically with criminal cases. As examples, measures such as the removal of non-judicial tasks or ensuring a balanced workload aim directly at ensuring an appropriate workload. Consensual settlement (whether by the parties alone or through mediation⁸) has an independent worth, reflecting the values of freedom of choice and agreement, compared with a court-imposed solution. Decriminalisation of minor offences may take place to reduce workload, or it may reflect a conclusion that it is preferable that certain types of offenders (e.g. youths) should be dealt with outside the formal criminal justice system. Clarity about motives may assist to identify the merits of particular proposals.

51. The CCJE starts with miscellaneous topics where the criminal and civil positions can be taken together or compared.

(a) Court administration

52. The CCJE has identified two basic models of court management⁹. In one, the judges play little or no direct role in the management of the courts. They can devote more of their

⁴ The issues of caseload and case management were dealt with within the framework of the 1st European Conference of Judges (see paragraph 8 above).

⁵ Recommendation No. R (86) 12 of the Committee of Ministers to the member States concerning measures to prevent and reduce the excessive work-load in the courts. It covers:

- (a) conciliation (or, to use the more current term, “mediation”) procedures, including lawyers’ duty to promote conciliation;
- (b) other extra-judicial dispute resolution procedures, including arbitration (and, although not expressly mentioned, ombudsmen);
- (c) the judge’s role to promote a friendly settlement;
- (d) the removal from judges of non-judicial tasks;
- (e) trial at first instance by single judges (as opposed to panels);
- (f) reviewing the competence of courts, to ensure a balanced distribution of workload;
- (g) evaluating the impact of legal (expenses) insurance, to see whether it encourages the filing of ill-founded claims.

Recommendation No. R (94) 12 of the Committee of Ministers to the member States reminded states that their duty to provide proper working conditions for judges included “taking appropriate steps to assign non-judicial tasks to other persons” in conformity with the earlier Recommendation.

⁶ Recommendation No. R (87) 18 of the Committee of Ministers to the member States concerning the simplification of criminal justice.

⁸ See section D of this Opinion.

⁹ Cf its Opinion No. 2 (2001) on the Funding and Management of Courts, paragraphs 12-13.

time to judging, rather than take up time on non-judicial tasks for which they may not be suited by training or inclination. Although the courts could not run properly without the judges at least being consulted about administrative matters, decisions about managing budgets, employing staff and court buildings and facilities are in the hands of the administrators. Since, whatever system is employed, the money to run it must come from central government, this system helps to keep judges separate from the political pressures that follow from having to meet performance targets.

53. A disadvantage is that it is judges who must deliver the primary objective of the court system, the efficient and just disposal of cases, but in this model, they have little control over the environment in which they are trying to meet this objective.

54. In the second basic system, the senior judge in a court effectively manages it as well. He or she will have at least some discretion over the spending of the budget, the hiring and firing of staff and the court building and its contents. The advantages and disadvantages are a mirror image of the first: judges are taken away from their primary role and made to undertake tasks for which their background may not have prepared them. They are more likely to find themselves in dispute with public authority. On the other hand, they have real control over the means of delivering justice in their courts and have a greater influence over policy in allocating resources.

55. Many countries have systems which fall somewhere between the two extremes. What can be said to be recognised as being increasingly important is that judges should be consulted and have the opportunity to have a say in basic decisions about the shape of modern justice and the priorities involved. The CCJE underlines the need for this.

(b) Fluctuation in workloads

56. The workload of particular courts will increase or decrease over time. Demographic changes and, in the criminal sphere, changes in criminal patterns will drive this. These may be temporary. For example, a court near a border may have a dramatic increase in cases concerning illegal immigration or a court near an airport an increase in cases concerning drug importation.

57. In some jurisdictions, judges and/or cases may be transferred relatively easily between courts, at least on a temporary basis. The CCJE regards such flexibility as generally desirable, provided that the independence of the individual judges is respected and, in the case of transfer of a judge, the judge consents. It recognises of course that it must be exercised with due regard for practical problems of access to justice. Those involved in cases and the public generally are entitled to expect that cases will normally be handled on a relatively local and convenient basis.

58. In other jurisdictions, the judge assigned is fixed from the outset, transfers of judges require their consent and transfers of cases are possible, if at all, only with the consent of the parties. There may however be mechanisms within any court, whereby, e.g., an elected praesidium of judges may decide to transfer cases from an overloaded judge to another judge within the same court.

59. If there are permanent changes in workload, corresponding changes in court size will be needed, especially in the latter category of jurisdictions. Purely economic considerations

(pointing towards closure of a local court) may here clash with the parties' and public's entitlement to relatively local and accessible justice. The CCJE encourages countries to study and develop appropriate criteria to enable these considerations to be taken into account and balanced, ensuring that, while adopting to the evolution of the workload, the changes to the courts' methods are not conceived as a way of harming the independence of judges.

60. Nevertheless, the CCJE refers to its Opinion No. 2 (2001), in particular paragraphs 4 and 5, dealing with adequate resources. The possibility to transfer judges or files from one court to other court should not encourage to accept structural lack of resources. Such flexibility cannot substitute a sufficient number of judges, which is necessary to meet the workload, which normally is to be expected.

(c) Use of a single judge

61. In criminal cases, Recommendation No. R (87) 18, paragraph D.2 states that a single judge should be used "wherever the seriousness of the offence allows". But, in serious cases involving the liberty of the subject, the collegiality of fact-finding provided by a panel of three or more judges, whether lay or professional, is an important safeguard against decisions influenced by one person's prejudices or idiosyncratic views. In practice, less serious cases are usually decided by one judge and more serious cases by a panel, although the dividing line differs considerably between countries.

62. In civil cases, the general practice in common law countries is that first instance judges (being experienced practitioners appointed relatively late in their professional career) sit singly. In other jurisdictions having a career judiciary (and in countries such as France, where tribunaux de commerce consist of laymen), panels are still used at first instance, although there seems to be a trend towards greater use of single judges.

63. The use of panels can compensate for lack of experience on the part of individual members. It assists to ensure consistency of quality and to impart experience to younger judges. It may be difficult to abandon this system where a young judge or lay person would otherwise be the sole member of a first instance tribunal.

64. The CCJE considers that countries should encourage training and career development to make the use of single judges easier to hear first instance cases, wherever this can be achieved commensurately with the experience and capabilities of the judges available and the nature of the proceedings in question.

(d) Judges' assistance

65. The CCJE noted in its Opinion No. 2 (2001) that in numerous countries the judges have insufficient means at their disposal. However, the CCJE points out the need that a genuine reduction of inappropriate tasks performed by judges can only take place by providing judges with assistants, with substantial qualifications in the legal field ("clerks" or "referendars"), to whom the judge may delegate, under the same judge's supervision and responsibility, the performance of specific activities such as research of legislation and case-law, drafting of easy or standardised documents, and liaising with lawyers and/or the public.

(e) Extra-judicial activity

66. The CCJE endorses the view that the non-judicial activities listed in the Appendix to Recommendation No. R (86) 12 should not normally be assigned to the judges. But there are other activities that may distract or detract from the performance of judicial duties, including activities in relation to court administration, where adequate assistance is not provided or funded (see point (a) above) and activity as private arbitrators, which is in most countries anyway inadmissible.

67. Criticism is often also levelled at time spent by judges working on commissions and similar bodies. There is a point of view that “a judge should be judging” and other activity is a waste of a valuable resource.

68. The CCJE does not consider that too much should be made of this point. If the commission is examining an aspect relevant to judicial work and the judge can add value to the work of that body, the time spent in such work cannot be regarded as wasted. Further, a judge will be a better judge for having the broader view that can be gained by working with professionals from other disciplines and on subjects that are related to but fall outside his normal work.

69. On the other hand, there are risks in judges becoming involved in enquiries established for political reasons, involving judgments on non-legal matters which may lie outside their direct experience. Judges should consider carefully whether it is sensible for them to lend their skills and reputations to enquiries of this nature¹⁰.

(f) Legal representation and the funding of legal costs

70. In criminal cases, it is right that legal aid or free legal representation should be available without evaluation of the merits of the defendant’s position. The problem seems to lie in the great differences between the nature and seriousness of the cases for which such aid or representation is made available in different countries. But in civil cases there is concern that methods of funding litigation may encourage ill-founded or excessive litigation, and this is not confined to legal expenses insurance¹¹. In any legal system, there is a tendency for work to gravitate to areas where fees are available. Suitable control systems need to be introduced for evaluating the merits of claims in advance and eliminating from eligibility for legal aid claims where the merits and/or sum in issue do not appear to justify the likely expense¹².

II. CRIMINAL COURTS

71. The CCJE turns next to subjects of specifically criminal relevance: It is at the outset important to remember two obvious but fundamental differences between criminal and civil proceedings:

¹⁰ The CCJE refers to its Opinion No. 3 (2002), where it considered judicial ethics.

¹¹ Concerning the last, see paragraph 26 above.

¹² A similar problem arises in respect of agreements (now permitted in the United Kingdom) for conditional fees – that is agreements whereby lawyers’ fees are not to be paid by the claimant instructing the lawyer unless the claim succeeds, but are then payable by the losing defendant together with an uplift of up to 100% which goes to the benefit of the winning claimant’s lawyers. Such agreements can be used by an impecunious claimant to vex defendants and force them to settle, since (i) the claimant and his lawyers have no incentive to agree a reasonable fee - on the contrary; and (ii) unless the claimant takes out legal expenses insurance, the defendant if he wins is unlikely to recover any costs from the losing claimant. The English courts have recently taken firmer control to limit the fees that can be agreed under such agreements and the conditions on which they can be made.

(i) Civil proceedings almost always involve two private parties. The public has a general interest in the proper disposal of civil litigation but it has no interest in the outcome of a particular case. In criminal proceedings, the public has a real interest in the proper disposal of each case.

(ii) Procedural delay or irregularity can be sanctioned in civil proceedings by orders for costs or, as a last resort, striking the action out. In criminal proceedings, the prosecution may be sanctioned in monetary terms¹³ or in an extreme situation by dismissing the prosecution. It is much more difficult to sanction a defendant for delay or irregularity, although in some countries a defence lawyer may be ordered to pay wasted costs. The defendant himself usually lacks means to meet costs orders. And the ultimate sanction of dismissal of his case is not available. The court cannot say that he has forfeited his right to a trial because he has not complied with some procedural requirement.

72. Against this background, the CCJE examines certain specific problems.

(a) Discretionary prosecution

73. Recommendation No. R (87) 18 endorses the principle of discretionary prosecution “wherever historical development and the constitution of member states allow”, and states that, “otherwise, measures having the same purpose should be devised”. In the latter countries, the duties of independent public prosecutors (ministère public) may require cases to be brought before a court, and, if anyone has the power to suspend prosecution, it may only be a judge.

74. The Recommendation states that any decision not to prosecute should be “founded in law” (paragraph I.2), “exercised on some general basis, such as the public interest” (paragraph II.4) and only take place “if the prosecuting authority has adequate evidence of guilt” (paragraph I.2). The CCJE interprets the third condition as meaning no more than that, unless the prosecuting authority has adequate evidence of guilt, the question of discretionary prosecution cannot sensibly arise. But, where adequate evidence has not (yet) been obtained, the CCJE considers that it should be open to an investigating authority to decide that the seriousness and other circumstances of the offence, of the suspected offender and of the victim do not justify further efforts to obtain further evidence.

75. The Recommendation further states that a decision not to pursue, or to discontinue, criminal proceedings may be accompanied by a warning or admonition or be made subject to compliance with conditions (requiring in this latter case the alleged offender’s consent); that it should not be treated as a conviction or affect the offender’s record, unless he has admitted the offence; and that it should leave unaffected the victim’s right to seek reparation. In practice, the majority of (but very far from all) countries have some degree of discretion. One distinction is between those systems where cases may only be discontinued with conditions such as compensation to the victim and those where there exists a discretion to discontinue proceedings where it is deemed not to be in the public interest to continue them.

76. Three basic structures presently appear in Europe.

¹³ One should consider if this is compatible with the public nature of the Prosecutor's Office in many countries.

(i) The prosecuting authority has neither the power to drop a case nor to impose conditions/sanctions upon an offender if the evidence justifies prosecution. It merely has the function of preparing a case for court.

(ii) The prosecuting authority has the power to decide whether or not to prosecute (i.e. to drop a case completely) even though there is sufficient evidence to prosecute.

(iii) The prosecuting authority has both the power to decide whether or not to prosecute and also the possibility of dropping the case with conditions or a fine imposed on the offender with his consent as an alternative to the case going to court. Within this broad category, there are considerable differences as to the prosecutorial power. In some countries a full range of conditions including counseling and community service may be imposed. In others, the only condition is payment of a sum of money.

77. The CCJE encourages further studies in individual states which do not presently have any system of or equivalent to discretionary prosecution so as to give effect to Recommendation No. R (87) 18. The CCJE is of the opinion that each state should consider the role that courts could have in verifying the procedure carried out, especially when the victim disputes the decision to drop a case taken by the prosecuting authority.

(b) Simplified procedures

78. All member states appear to have some forms of simplified procedure, e.g. for administrative breaches and less serious crime, although the nature and extent of such procedures vary greatly. The impact of articles 5 and 6 of the ECHR must be considered when introducing and providing for such procedures always allowing for the possibility of an appeal before the judge.

(c) Guilty pleas and plea bargaining

79. Recommendation No. R (87) 18 recommends this in principle. Its terms contemplate an early plea of guilty entered in court at an early stage of the proceedings, which is the common law model. However, few countries have a formal system of this nature. It - and more particularly what may go with it, plea bargaining and a reduced sentence for a plea of guilty - are anathema to many non-common law systems. However, a number of countries have a system of attenuated proceedings where guilt is admitted. This functions in a similar way to a formal plea to the extent of allowing less evidence to be called and the case to proceed more swiftly.

80. The CCJE identifies, in any formal system for pleading guilty, advantages (perceived by common law systems) and possible dangers, as follows:

(i) Guilty pleas

81. If a defendant can be invited and is able to give a formal indication before a judge that he admits his guilt at an early stage in proceedings, a great deal of time and money will be saved. If this takes place in a formal setting, safeguards for a defendant can be built in. A confession made to the police may have been improperly obtained. A guilty plea is an acknowledgement that it was not. Lawyers must however have a professional obligation to confirm with the defendant that he really admits the necessary legal elements of the offence.

(ii) Plea bargaining

82. This encompasses two different things: charge bargaining and sentence bargaining.

83. Charge bargaining involves an agreement with the prosecution, whether formal or informal, that the prosecution will not proceed with one or more charges if the defendant admits others (e.g. involving a less serious offence). Such a procedure will not normally involve the judge at all, although there may be provision for judicial approval to be required. The argument in favour is that, if a defendant is willing to admit nine out of ten alleged burglaries, it cannot be in the interests of efficient justice that there should always have to be a full trial of the tenth charge simply because there is enough evidence to go to trial on it.

84. Sentence bargaining also occurs in a number of countries. But the common law has recognised that there are great dangers in allowing this to involve the judge. The danger is that a defendant may fall under pressure to plead guilty to an offence which he does not really admit in order to get a more lenient sentence from the judge who will be sentencing him.

(iii) Sentence discount

85. This is a different concept, which does not depend upon any bargain with anyone, whether prosecution or judge. The concept (accepted in some countries) is that a defendant who pleads guilty should normally receive a more lenient sentence than if he had not done so – the earlier the plea the greater the discount¹⁴.

86. Some may recoil from this idea. They would argue that what the defendant has done, he has done and that any offence deserves a certain punishment, once proved, whether it is admitted or not. The argument that a plea of guilty shows remorse is, in most cases, illusory. In some cases, a principled social answer is possible for those systems where trials are largely oral. If the main witness is vulnerable (particularly children and victims of sexual assault), the oral hearing may constitute a further trauma. In such cases, by his plea avoiding the need for a hearing, a defendant has lessened or avoided harm which his actions would otherwise have caused.

87. Outside this minority of cases, such an answer is not valid. If a man is charged with a series of burglaries because of fingerprint or scientific evidence, the only witnesses he has saved from giving evidence are professionals, well used to giving evidence. The reason for encouraging pleas of guilty by a discount then is the pragmatic advantages that guilty pleas bring in (i) ensuring the conviction of offenders, who know that they are guilty, but who would otherwise have no incentive not to insist on a trial in the hope that the evidence or witnesses against them might not persuade a jury or judge and (ii) shortening cases (and avoiding delay to other trials, even in cases where a conviction would anyway have resulted from a full trial. These are real pragmatic benefits for society as a whole.

88. But it is clear that, if sentence discounts are to be permitted, certain safeguards must be in place. Care must be taken by the lawyers and the judges to ensure that the pleas of guilty are voluntary and represent real admissions of guilt. Judges should not mention or be involved in any discussions between lawyers and the defendant regarding the possibility of such a discount. Judges should have the power not to approve of any plea, which it appears may not be truthful or in the public interest.

89. The CCJE doubts whether it would be realistic to recommend immediate implementation of a system of sentence discount for a guilty plea in all member states. But the CCJE recommends all countries to consider whether such a system might not bring benefits to their criminal justice process.

III. CIVIL COURTS

90. Recommendation No. R (84) 5 identified nine “principles of civil procedure designed to improve the functioning of civil justice”. This was a far-sighted early Recommendation, but still in practice often unimplemented. The CCJE considers that it would, if implemented generally, offer a real guarantee of compliance with states’ duty under article 6 of the ECHR to ensure “a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time” in civil proceedings.

91. The nine principles set out core elements of the case management powers which the CCJE considers that judges should have and exercise from the commencement to the conclusion of all civil (including administrative) proceedings in order to ensure compliance with article 6 of the ECHR. The CCJE will therefore summarise and comment on these Principles in a little detail.

92. Principle 1 of the Recommendation suggests a limit in proceedings of “not more than two hearings”, one preliminary and the second for evidence, arguments and, if possible, judgment, with no adjournments allowed “except when new facts appear and in other exceptional and important circumstances” and sanctions on parties, witnesses and experts failing to comply with court time-limits or non-attendance.

93. The CCJE views this principle as a general template. Some systems take evidence over a number of hearings. Others handle very large litigation which could not possibly be conducted within the constraints of one preliminary and one final hearing. The most important point is that judges should from the outset control the timetable and duration of proceedings, setting firm dates and having (and being willing wherever appropriate to exercise) power to refuse adjournments, even against the wishes of both parties.

94. Under Principle 2, judges should have power to control abuse of procedure, by sanctions on a party or lawyers.

95. Principle 3 reflects the essence of modern case management:

“The court should (...) play an active role in ensuring the rapid progress of the proceedings, while respecting the rights of the parties, including the right to equal treatment. In particular, it should have proprio motu powers to order the parties to provide such clarifications as are necessary; to order the parties to appear in person; to raise questions of law; to call for evidence, at least in those cases where there are interests other than those of the parties at stake; to control the taking of evidence; to exclude witnesses whose possible testimony would be irrelevant to the case; to limit the number of witnesses on a particular fact where such a number would be excessive (...).”

96. Principle 4 supplements this, by providing that the court should, except in cases expressly prescribed by law, be able to decide whether to use written or oral proceedings.

97. Principle 5 addresses what is, in the CCJE's view, a vital aspect of efficient case management: the need to crystallise the parties' claims and the nature of their evidence at the earliest possible stage – and to exclude the admission of new facts on appeal, unless they were (or, the CCJE would suggest, could not reasonably have been) known at first instance or there was some other special reason.

98. In some countries, the rules or culture governing litigation allow parties to correct and supplement their cases and evidence almost without restriction – even at an appellate level (see further below). The CCJE considers that this is no longer acceptable, and that the time has come to re-examine such rules and change such culture. Parties are entitled to “a fair ...hearing within a reasonable time” of their claim or defence, not to indefinite opportunities to present further and different cases - and especially not so by way of a second instance hearing on appeal.

99. Principle 6 is the important injunction that “Judgment should be given at the conclusion of the proceedings or as far as possible thereafter. The judgment should be as concise as possible. It may invoke any rule of law but it should with certainty resolve, expressly or implicitly, all claims raised by the parties”. Some states or courts operate more or less with formal rules stipulating maximum period(s) within which judgments should be delivered. Principle 7 (“steps should be taken to deter the abuse of post-judgment legal remedies”) lies outside the central concerns of this Opinion.

100. Principle 8 identifies some aspects of case management, including special procedures for (a) urgent cases, (b) undisputed cases, liquidated claims and small claims, (c) specific types of case. Among these are, it states:

“simplified methods of commencing litigation; no hearing or the convening of only one hearing, or (...) of a preliminary preparatory hearing; exclusively written or oral proceedings (...); prohibition or restriction of certain exceptions and defences; more flexible rules of evidence’ no adjournments or only brief adjournments; the appointment of a court expert (...); an active role for the court in conducting the case and in calling for and taking evidence.”

101. Principle 9 emphasises the need for “the most modern technical means [to] be made available to the judicial authorities”. The CCJE endorses and underlines the relationship between efficient technology and judges' ability to keep track of and control the litigation on their or their courts' dockets.

102. The general rationale of all these principles is that civil litigation threatens to become complex and lengthy to the point where it is not possible to comply with the requirements of article 6 (1) of the ECHR either in any particular case(s) or in any other cases, the speedy and efficient conduct of which is indirectly affected by the time and resources occupied by the former case(s).

103. States have to provide adequate - but not infinite - resources and funding for civil as well as criminal litigation¹⁵. Because neither the state nor parties have infinite resources, courts must control litigation, in the interests both of individual litigants and litigants in other cases.

104. Individual cases need to be conducted “proportionately”, meaning both in a manner that enables the parties thereto to obtain justice at a cost commensurate with the issues involved and the amounts at stake, and in a manner that enables other litigants to obtain their fair share of the court’s time for their disputes.

105. In short, parties are entitled to an appropriate share of the court’s time and attention, but in deciding what is appropriate it is the judge’s duty to take into account the burden on and needs of others, including the state which is itself funding the court system and other parties who wish to use it.

106. Different countries have differing levels of implementation of the principles in Recommendation No. R (84) 5. The general direction of legal reforms of civil procedure instituted over recent years has been in this direction. Judges have been given greater power on the “formal conduct” of civil proceedings, though not over their substantive progress – they cannot, for example, take steps to introduce into a case factual evidence that the parties have not adduced. However, in some member states it is still not the judge’s role to decide whether the procedure should be oral or written, or when to resort a summary judgment or to set time limits, because these matters are fixed by law. The CCJE considers that these restrictions to the powers of control and impetus of the judge on the progress of the procedure are not compatible with efficiency of justice.

107. The CCJE will now consider certain procedures which have been adopted or suggested in this area:

(a) Pre-action protocols

108. Pre-action protocols (developed in the United Kingdom) prescribe steps which should be taken before proceedings are even commenced. They are formulated by co-operation between representatives of those interested on both sides of certain familiar types of dispute (personal injury or medical negligence or construction industry insurers, lawyers and interested bodies). Their purpose is to achieve early identification of the issues, by exchange of information and evidence, which may enable parties to avoid litigation and reach a settlement. If settlement cannot be reached they ensure that parties are in a much better position to respond to timetables imposed once proceedings are issued. The court may sanction failure to follow a pre-action protocol.

(b) Pre-action information

109. This is a feature of litigation which enables a court, before litigation is begun, to order disclosure of documents by a person likely to be a party to such proceedings, where this is desirable, amongst other reasons, to enable that person to know whether the facts justify proceedings at all, or to enable him to take better informed steps to resolve the dispute amicably without proceedings.

¹⁵ Cf CCJE Opinion No. 2 (2001).

(c) Protective measures

110. It is important that these should be available, where required, at an early stage, including in some cases before notification of the issue of proceedings to a defendant, or their purpose may be defeated.

111. A wide range of protective measures is available. Three main groups can be identified:

- (i) measures aiming to secure enforcement, e.g. seizure or a “freezing” injunction;
- (ii) measures intended to settle the situation provisionally (for instance, in family matters); and
- (iii) measures anticipating the final judgment.

112. In many countries, the claimant has to present an appearance of right (fumus bonis iuris) and he must normally show a risk that, without such measures, any final judgment obtained could not be enforced (periculum in mora). The measure can be ordered without hearing the other party (ex parte) but, after making such an order, the defendant has a right to be heard, when the measure can be either confirmed or revoked.

113. Injunctive relief is also widely available in other situations in member states (sometimes only if the claim has a documentary basis), in order to settle provisionally some aspect(s) of the dispute. Common law countries have also developed the tool of the “Anton Piller” order, whereby the court can order a search for documents or other evidence in the defendant’s possession or control, which might otherwise be destroyed or concealed. “Mesures d’instruction” in futurum can fulfil a similar function in France and other countries.

(d) Commencement of proceedings

114. Most member states have provided certain simplified (including electronic) methods of commencing litigation. But differences between the traditional methods of commencing proceedings make it difficult to compare the different methods of simplification. For example, in some countries, proceedings have always been begun by steps taken in court, whereas in others the plaintiff has had to notify the claim to the defendant before going to court. In the latter states, the simplification may simply consist in allowing proceedings to be begun without this step being taken.

(e) Identification of the parties’ cases

115. The CCJE has already underlined the importance of this in its discussion (above) of Principle 5 of Recommendation No. R (85) 5. It is central to good case management that each party in civil proceedings should have to be as explicit as possible as soon as possible regarding its case – and that changes or additions to a party’s case should not be made as of right, but should require the judge’s permission, which should only be given or withheld having regard to the stage which the proceedings have reached and the effect on their conduct as well as on other parties.

(f) Summary proceedings

116. There are major differences in terminology in this area. Not all states understand the concept of summary, simplified and accelerated procedures in the same sense. Some only speak of procedures as summary when their outcome does not have the force of res judicata, and refer to simplified procedures when certain steps have been eliminated or made easy, and to accelerated procedures when time limits have been abbreviated compared with ordinary proceedings. These features can of course coincide, so that a procedure can, at the same time, be summary, simplified and accelerated.

117. Common law jurisdictions in contrast use the word “summary” to cover simplified and accelerated procedures leading to a final (res judicata) decision, although they also have procedures for provisional judgments, e.g. procedures whereby the court may, if provisionally satisfied that a defendant will be liable in debt or damages, order an “interim” payment of not more than a “reasonable proportion” of the liability to be paid to the claimant. If at a trial the claimant then fails to prove his case, the claimant must repay the interim payment, with interest.

118. Two civil law procedures are of particular importance: i) the order for payment (Mahnverfahren, injonction de payer); ii) the référé or, in the Netherlands, kort geding:

(i) The order for payment (or Mahnverfahren) is a procedure especially suited to uncontested monetary debts. At a claimant’s request, the court issues an order to pay without having heard the other party. In some countries a documentary basis is required for issuing the order, in other countries it is sufficient with the statement done by the claimant. If the defendant remains passive during the delay established by the law, the order becomes enforceable like an ordinary judgment. If the defendant objects, the plaintiff has to start a normal procedure if he wants to recover his debt. It is the debtor’s silence that transforms the initial order of payment into a judicial and enforceable decision that has the force of res judicata. In some countries a court clerk is in charge of the procedure. It is a written procedure, which permits computerized treatment (already in operation in some countries). Many cases are determined by this procedure.

(ii) The procedure of référé or kort geding enables a judge to decide any question after hearing the parties on the basis of the sometimes limited evidence that they are able to put before the court within a short time-limit. A decision is then rendered either immediately after the hearing or within a very short time. This is directly enforceable but the judgment does not have the force of res judicata. A party is free to commence a procedure on the merits, but if none is initiated, the référé judgment will determine the rights and obligations of the parties. Thus, the procedure on the merits will often never take place. Because of the importance of the référé, an experienced judge (often the president of the court) is normally in charge of this kind of procedure. The référé procedure in practice also assists to alleviate a court’s workload, and to avoid the delays inherent in some states in ordinary civil proceedings.

(g) Interlocutory judgments

119. The power to “direct a separate trial of any issue” can have real importance. To take an example, matters fundamental to jurisdiction should, in the CCJE’s view, be resolved by a separate judgment at the outset of proceedings. This avoids the need for unnecessary, costly and time-consuming argument and investigation on the merits. But in some countries there exists no procedure for giving interlocutory judgments, and in others any interlocutory judgment can only be appealed after the first instance court has gone into and determined the rest of the case.

120. The CCJE recognises that care is necessary in the selection and definition of issues suitable to be dealt with by interlocutory judgment. There is a risk that time, effort and costs may be spent on an interlocutory issue (or on an appeal in an interlocutory issue), when it would be speedier and simpler to resolve the rest of the case. With that caveat, the CCJE recommends that the procedure for giving interlocutory judgments should be available, and that immediate appeals in respect of interlocutory judgments should normally be permissible.

121. The remedies for avoiding delays due to such appeals should consist in either a requirement to obtain the permission of the court of first instance or appeal for any immediate appeal and/or a speedy appellate system.

(h) Evidence and documentation

122. Most states have flexible rules of evidence. In protective and summary procedures, the judgment will not necessarily be based on full evidence. In protective measures, the claimant need only present an appearance of his right (prima facie evidence) in civil law countries, or need normally only show an arguable case on the facts in common law countries.

123. There are important differences in relation to disclosure of documentation between common law and civil law countries. In the former each party must voluntarily make disclosure of relevant documents (that is documents on which he relies in support of his contentions or which materially affect his case or support the other party's case). The requirement to disclose unfavourable as well as favourable documents often proves a considerable incentive to settlement - either before or after disclosure has had to be made. It is also a considerable aid to fact-finding, at trial.

124. However, this procedure does rely on the honesty of legal advisers in advising their clients regarding production of documents, and it also involves legal and other costs in searching for and producing documents. It may be said therefore to be particularly suitable for larger or more complex cases.

125. In many other countries (especially civil law systems) a party can only gain access to a document under his opponent's control and upon which the latter does not intend to rely, by applying for an order that the particular document be made available. This implies that the party seeking the order has to know previously the existence of the document and has to identify it, which is not always easy.

(i) General case management powers

126. These are important at every stage of civil proceedings, to enable cases to be managed appropriately and proportionately. Judges should be able to exercise them by giving directions on paper, without the parties necessarily having any right to an oral hearing. They should be exercisable as contemplated by Recommendation No. R (84) 5 both in relation to pre-trial preparation and in relation to any trial.

(j) Incentives in respect of costs and interest

127. English law and some other systems have introduced provisions for offers to settle and payments into court, which can have severe financial consequences for a party failing at trial to better the other side's previous offer. A claimant may offer to accept, or a defendant may offer to pay, less than the full claim. (In the case of a money claim, the defendant must also follow up his offer, by paying the money into court.) If a claimant gets more than he offered to accept, or a defendant is ordered to pay less than he offered to pay, then, save in the case of small claims, adverse consequences may follow in costs, and also, for a defendant, in interest.

128. In some countries, where lawyers' fees are regulated by statute, the legislature, in order to provide an incentive for lawyers to encourage settlement, has raised the statutory settlement fees for lawyers to 150% of the normal full fee.

(k) Enforcement

129. There are at present differences in attitude to enforcement of first instance judgments. In common law jurisdictions, the general rule is that such judgments are automatically enforceable, unless the court for good reason orders a stay. Good reason could include any unlikelihood of recovering monies paid, if the judgment were later set aside on a successful appeal. In civil law countries, in contrast, the position is sometimes regulated by law, sometimes left to the judge to decide. The judge may then grant provisional enforcement of the judgment, especially if there is a danger that, during the delay involved in any appeal, a situation might occur or be brought about by the losing party whereby the judgment would never be honoured. Normally, however, the winning party would then be required to provide security for any damage that might occur as a result of the enforcement if the judgment was reversed on appeal. It can be said to be usual in the case of money judgments for the judgment to be made enforceable by law or by the judge unless the debtor puts up security.

130. The CCJE considers that, to ensure the efficiency of justice, all countries should have procedures for provisional enforcement, which should normally be ordered, subject to satisfactory protection being made available to the losing party against the event of a successful appeal.

(l) Appeals

131. The different appellate systems divide into two broad groups: (a) appeals limited to revision on matters of law and the assessment of evidence, with no possibility on appeal of fresh new evidence or of a decision on any point not raised before the first instance judge; and (b) appeals in which such limitations do not exist and the court can hear new evidence and take into account new points raised in the proceedings before the appellate court.

132. There are intermediate systems, which in some cases or at some instances permit what is described as the "ordinary remedy" of an unlimited appeal, but in other cases or at other instances (e.g. in a court of cassation or Supreme Court) only permit the "extra-ordinary remedy" of a "review" on limited basis and in specific circumstances.

133. The difference between (a) and (b) is sometimes explained as being that in the former group an appeal is viewed primarily as a technique for ensuring uniformity in the application of legal principles (ius constitutionis), whereas in the latter group it is viewed as a procedural right, the main function of which is to give a party another opportunity (ius litigationis). That raises the question whether it is necessary or desirable that a party should have such a procedural right at any level, even a second instance level.

134. The CCJE has, in considering Principle 5 of Recommendation No. R (84) 5 (above), pointed out that nothing in article 6 of the ECHR requires the right to the appeal.

135. Although conscious of the weight of tradition in some countries favouring an unlimited right to (in effect) relitigate issues on appeal to a second instance, the CCJE wishes to indicate its disapproval in principle of this approach. There ought to be limitations on a party's right to adduce fresh evidence or to raise fresh points of law. An appeal ought not to be or to be regarded as an unlimited opportunity to make corrections in respect of matters of fact or law which a party could and should have put before a first instance judge. This undermines the role of the first instance judge, and has the potential to make irrelevant any case management by a first instance judge.

136. In the CCJE's view, it also tends to frustrate the legitimate expectations of the other party to the litigation, and to increase the length, cost and strain of litigation.

137. The CCJE notes, however, that even in countries accepting a ius litigationis, mechanisms (e.g. the power to declare hopeless appeals to be "manifestly ill-founded") have been developed which constitute a partial safety valve, reducing to some extent the overloading of the appellate system.

138. The CCJE therefore recommends that controls on unmeritorious appeal be introduced, either by provision of a leave to appeal to be granted by a court or by an equivalent mechanism that ensures that the speedy disposition of meritorious appeals is not impaired.

D. ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION (ADR)

139. The Council of Europe has produced several instruments concerning alternative dispute resolution methods (ADR).¹⁶ Being aware of the many positive effects of ADR, among which is its potential to lead to speedy settlement of disputes, the CCJE proposed that ADR be one of the items to be dealt with at the 1st European Conference of Judges, within the larger framework of "case management".

140. The 1st European Conference of Judges demonstrated the importance of ADR in the early settlement of disputes.¹⁷ It is apparent that while ADR must not be regarded as a perfect way of alleviating the courts' excess workload, it is definitely useful and effective because it

¹⁸The Council of Europe has produced the following Recommendations relating to alternative dispute resolution:

- Recommendation No R (98) 1 of the Committee of Ministers to the member States on family mediation;
- Recommendation No R (99) 19 of the Committee of Ministers to the member States concerning mediation in penal matters;
- Recommendation Rec (2001) 9 of the Committee of Ministers to the member States on alternatives to litigation between administrative authorities and private parties;
- Recommendation Rec (2002) 10 of the Committee of Ministers to the member States on mediation in civil matters.

¹⁷ The Conference mainly concentrated on ADR in civil matters.

places the accent on an agreement between the parties, which is always preferable to an imposed judgement.

141. In the future the CCJE may engage in specific consideration of ADR. At present, within the scope of an opinion concerned with the reasonable duration of trials and the role of judges in the trial, the CCJE considers it necessary to encourage the development of ADR schemes, which are particularly suited to certain types of litigation, and to increase public awareness of their existence, the way they operate and their cost.

142. Since ADR and the justice system share similar objectives, it is essential that legal aid should be available for ADR as it is for standard court proceedings. However, both legal aid resources as well as any other public expenditures to support ADR should make use of a special budget, so that the corresponding expenses are not charged to the operating budget of the courts (see paragraph 23 above).

143. The discussions held within the CCJE focused specifically on the scope of mediation, on the role of the judge in mediation during court proceedings, on confidentiality of mediation operations, on the possibility that courts supervise training/accreditation in mediation and judges act as mediators and on the necessity of a judicial confirmation of the mediation agreement between the parties. Separate considerations were made, when relevant, for criminal law matters, on one hand, and civil law (and administrative law) matters, on the other hand.

144. As for the scope of ADR, the relevant Council of Europe recommendations show that it is not confined to civil proceedings. The scope of mediation in criminal matters raises specific questions, on which the CCJE's discussions concentrated.

145. Unlike ADR in civil matters, criminal mediation is not useful to alleviate the current workload of the court system, although it may have a preventative effect in respect of future crimes.

146. Recommendation No. R (99) 19 concentrates solely on "mediation" between offender and victim. However, although there is a need for further research, the CCJE considers that nowadays the wider debate concerns the broader concept of "restorative justice", i.e. procedures allowing diversion from the normal criminal process before it starts (soon after arrest), after it has started as part of the sentencing process or even during the execution of punishment. Restorative justice provides an opportunity for victims, offenders and sometimes representatives of the community to communicate, indirectly or directly, if necessary through a facilitator, about an offence (usually a minor offence concerning property or offences by young offenders) and how to repair the harm caused. This can lead to the offender making reparation - either to the victim, if the victim wishes, or to the wider community, for example by repairing property, cleaning premises, etc.

147. Therefore the scope of restorative justice in criminal matters is not as wide as ADR in civil matters; society may set "boundaries of permission" outside which it would not support the resolution of a criminal case other than by the normal court process. In contrast with civil cases, the community will also often be a proper participant in the process of restorative justice. Reconnecting offenders with the community they have harmed, including through repair of some of the damage they have caused, and involving the community in creating solutions to crime in their area, is at the heart of much restorative justice.

148. In a number of respects schemes for restorative justice require more careful implementation than ADR in civil disputes, as bringing victims and offenders into contact is a much more sensitive process than bringing two parties to a civil dispute together; its success depends in part on a cultural change for criminal justice practitioners used to the normal trial and punishment model of justice.

149. The CCJE discussed the role of the judge in mediation decisions considering first of all that recourse to mediation, in civil and administrative proceedings, may be chosen on the parties' initiative or, alternatively, the judge may be allowed to recommend that the parties appear before a mediator, with their refusal to do so sometimes being relevant to costs.

150. The second system has the advantage of having parties, who are in principle reluctant to seek an agreement, initiate a discussion; in practice, this step can in itself prove decisive in breaking the deadlock in a contentious situation.

151. In any case, the parties should also be allowed to refuse recourse to mediation; such a refusal should not infringe the party's right to have his/her case decided.

152. As for the role of the judge in criminal mediation, it is evident that, if a criminal case is diverted from the normal prosecution process before proceedings have been started, the judge will usually have no role. If the case is diverted to restorative justice after it has started, it will require an order of a judge so diverting it. There are also differences relating to the adoption, in the several countries, of the principles of discretionary or mandatory prosecution.

153. In view of the fact that within the restorative justice system obligations are imposed on the offender and restrictions may apply in the victim's interest, the CCJE considers that it may be good practice to give to all restorative justice arrangements (or, if appropriate, those that are more than mere warnings with no legal relevance) the formality of judicial approval. This will allow control of the offences that might give rise to restorative justice and of the conditions governing respect for the right to a fair trial and other provisions of the ECHR.

154. Must mediation operations be confidential? The CCJE's discussions show that this question must be answered in the affirmative regarding civil and administrative disputes. Seeking an agreement means, in general, that the parties must be able to talk to the mediator in confidence about possible proposals for settlement, without it being possible for this information to be divulged.

155. However, it would be useful to specify whether confidentiality should be absolute or whether it may be lifted by agreement between the parties. Also, one should ask whether the documents used during mediation may be produced in court if mediation has failed.

156. As the mediation procedure is based on agreement, it would seem possible to the CCJE to lift confidentiality in the event of an agreement between the parties; on the other hand, without such agreement it is inappropriate for the judge to take account of documents revealing one party's attitudes or the proposals made by the mediator for settling the dispute. It is open to question whether and how far the judge may (as permitted in some jurisdictions) consider refusal to access mediation or to accept a friendly settlement when making orders relating to trial expenses or costs.

157. As for confidentiality in ADR in criminal matters, the CCJE considers that, since the offender must be encouraged to speak frankly during the restorative justice process, confidentiality should also apply to this type of ADR. This poses the problem, especially in those systems where prosecution is obligatory, of what should be the consequences of admission of other offences on the part of the offender or of persons who are not participating in the mediation process.¹⁸

158. Both in criminal and civil-administrative matters, the CCJE emphasises the need that ADR schemes be closely associated with the court system, since mediators should possess relevant skills and qualifications, as well as the necessary impartiality and independence for such a public service.

159. Therefore the CCJE emphasises the importance of training in mediation.

160. Recourse to mediators or mediation institutions outside the judicial system is an appropriate arrangement, provided that the judicial institution can supervise the competence of these mediators or private institutions as well as the arrangements for their intervention and their cost. The CCJE considers that appropriate legal provisions or court practice should confer the judge the power to direct the parties to appear before a judicially appointed mediator.

161. The CCJE considers it possible for judges to act as mediators themselves. This allows judicial know-how to be placed at the disposal of the public. It is nevertheless essential to preserve their impartiality in particular by providing that they will perform this task in disputes other than those they are required to hear and decide. The CCJE considers that a similar measure be taken within those systems that already provide for the duty of the judge to attempt conciliation of the parties to a case.

162. Judicial supervision of appointment of mediators is only one of the elements of a system designed to prevent dangers connected with privatisation of dispute resolution (and possible restrictions of substantial and procedural rights of the parties) that may result from a wide recourse to ADR. The CCJE considers that it is also essential that courts control the mediation proceedings and their outcome.

163. It emerged from the CCJE's discussions that in some circumstances the parties may be granted the right to settle a dispute by an agreement which is not subject to confirmation by the judge. However, such confirmation might prove essential in certain cases, particularly where enforcement measures have to be considered.

164. At least in this case the judge must enjoy substantial supervisory powers, particularly concerning respect for equality between the parties, the reality of their consent to the measures provided for by the agreement and respect for the law and for public policy. As for specific aspects concerning criminal mediation, the CCJE may recall here the considerations in paragraph 147 above.

SUMMARY OF THE RECOMMENDATIONS AND CONCLUSIONS

¹⁸ Paragraph 14 of Appendix to Recommendation No. R (99) 19 only states that "Participation in mediation should not be used as evidence of admission of guilt in subsequent legal proceedings".

A. Access to justice

A.1. States should provide dissemination of suitable information on the functioning of the judicial system (nature of proceedings available; duration of proceedings in the average and in the various courts; costs and risks involved in case of wrongful use of legal channels; alternative means of settling disputes offered to parties; landmark decisions delivered by the courts - see paragraphs 12-15 above).

A.2. In particular:

- citizens' guides should be made available;
- courts themselves should participate in disseminating the information;
- education programmes should include a description of the judicial system and should offer visits to courts (see paragraphs 16-17 above).

A.3. Simplified and standardised formats for the legal documents needed to initiate and proceed with court actions should be adopted, at least for some sectors of litigation (see paragraph 18 above).

A.4. Technology should be developed whereby litigants may, via computer facilities:

- obtain the necessary documents for bringing an action before a court;
- be put directly in touch with the courts;
- obtain full information, even before proceedings are instituted, as to the nature and the amount of the costs they will have to bear, and indication of the foreseeable duration of the proceedings up to the judgment (see paragraph 19 above).

A.5. The remuneration of lawyers and court officers should be fixed in such a way as not to encourage needless procedural steps (see paragraph 28 above).

A.6. Provision should be made, pursuant to Recommendation No. R (84) 5 (principle 2-1 in the appendix), for sanctioning abuse of court procedure (see paragraph 28 above).

A.7. States should guarantee the right for a litigant to plead his or her case before a court either personally or through the representative of his or her choice, particularly when simplified proceedings, litigation of minor financial importance, and consumers' cases are involved; there should be, however, provision enabling the judge, as an exceptional measure, to order the intervention of counsel if the case presents particular problems (see paragraphs 24-26 above).

A.8. A legal aid system should be organised by the State to enable everyone to enjoy access to justice, covering not only court costs but also legal advice as to the wisdom or the necessity of bringing an action; it should not be reserved for the neediest persons but should also be available, at least in part, to those whose average income does not enable them to bear the cost of an action unaided; the judge should be able to take part in decisions concerning the grant of aid, making sure that the obligation of the objective impartiality is respected (see paragraphs 21 and 22 above).

A.9. Legal aid ought to be financed by a public authority and covered by a special budget, so that the corresponding expenses are not charged to the operating budget of the courts (see paragraph 23 above).

B. Quality of the justice system and its assessment; quantitative statistical data; monitoring procedures

B.1. The quality of the justice system depends both on the quality of infra-structures, which may be measured with criteria similar to those employed for other public services, and on the ability performance of legal professionals (judges, but also lawyers, prosecutors and clerks), whose work may be only measured against the benchmarks of law and of judicial or professional practice and deontology (see paragraph 31 above).

B.2. It is necessary to assess the quality of judicial activity, with reference also to social and economic efficiency, through criteria that are sometimes similar to those employed for other public services (see paragraphs 32 and 33 above).

B.3. The evaluation of the activity of the court system as a whole or of each individual court or local group of courts should not be confused with the evaluation of the professional ability of every single judge, which has other purposes. Similar considerations may apply to the activities of other legal professionals involved in the functioning of the court system (see paragraphs 33 and 34 above).

B.4. The overlap between quality assessment of justice and professional evaluation of a judge should also be avoided when designing judicial statistics; in particular, the use of reversal rates as the only or even necessarily an important indicator to assess the quality of the judicial activity is inappropriate; the same consideration applies to other systems in which some assessment, through systems different from the observation of the reversal rate, is possible as to an individual decision taken by judges (see paragraphs 35-37 above).

B.5. Although no generally accepted criteria exist at this moment as to data to be collected, the goal of data collection should consist in the evaluating justice in its wider context, i.e. in the interactions of justice with other variables (judges and lawyers, justice and police, case law and legislation, etc.), as most malfunctions of the justice system derive from lack of coordination between several actors (see paragraph 39 above).

B.6. It is also crucial to underline, in the data collection procedures, the interaction between the quality of justice and the presence of adequate infra-structures and support personnel (see paragraphs 31 and 39 above).

B.7. Furthermore, "quality" of justice should not be understood as a synonym for mere "productivity" of the judicial system; a qualitative approach should address rather the ability of the system to match the demand of justice in conformity with the general goals of the legal system, of which speed of procedures is only one element (see paragraphs 38-42 above).

B.8. Quality indicators should be chosen by wide consensus among legal professionals (see paragraph 43 above).

B.9. Data collection and monitoring should be performed on a regular basis, and procedures carried out by the independent body should allow a ready adjustment of the organisation of courts to changes in the caseloads (see paragraphs 46-48 above).

B.10. In order to reconcile the realisation of this need with the guarantees of independence of the judiciary, the independent body mentioned in paragraphs 37 and 45 of the CCJE's

Opinion No. 1 (2001) should be competent for the choice and the collection of "quality" data, the design of the data collection procedure, the evaluation of results, its dissemination as feed-back, as well as the monitoring and follow-up procedures. The States should, in any case, assure that such activities remain within the public sphere in order to preserve the relevant policy interests linked with the data treatment concerning justice (see paragraphs 43-48 above).

C. Case-load and case management

General

C.1. The recommendations in Recommendation No. R (87) 18 regarding reduction in the workload of courts should be implemented.

C.2. States should provide adequate resources for criminal and civil courts, and judges should (even where they have no direct administrative role) be consulted and have a say in basic decisions about the shape of modern justice and the priorities involved (see paragraphs 52-55 above).

C.3. Judges should encourage consensual settlement (whether by the parties alone or through mediation) since it has an independent worth, reflecting the values of freedom of choice and agreement, compared with a court-imposed solution (see paragraph 50 above and section D below).

C.4. It is generally desirable, in countries whose constitutional arrangements so permit, that there should be some flexibility enabling judges and/or cases to be transferred relatively easily between courts, at least on a temporary basis and subject to their consent, to cater for fluctuations in workload. Regard should always be had, when considering court closures, to the right of citizens to have convenient access to their courts (see paragraph 57-60 above).

C.5. The use of a single judge should be facilitated to determine guilt or innocence within conditions mentioned in paragraphs 61-64 above. The CCJE also considers that countries should encourage training and career development to make full use of single judges to hear first instance cases, wherever this can be achieved commensurately with the experience and capabilities of the judges available and the nature of the proceedings (see paragraphs 61-64 above).

C.6. The judges should have one or more personal assistants having good qualifications in the legal field to which they can delegate certain activities (see paragraph 65 above).

C.7. The non-judicial activities listed in Recommendation No. R (86) 12 should be assigned to bodies or individuals other than judges, and attention should be given to the risks inherent when judges are permitted to undertake other private work, which might impact on their public duties. Judges should not be discouraged from serving on relevant commissions and other out-of-court bodies but should exercise particular caution before accepting appointment in cases where essentially non-legal judgments are involved (see paragraphs 66-69 above).

C.8. In criminal cases, legal aid or free legal representation should be available without evaluation of the merits of the defendant's position. The CCJE recommends further study of the differences between the nature and seriousness of the cases for which such aid or representation is available in different countries. In civil cases suitable control systems need to be introduced for evaluating the merits of claims in advance (see paragraph 70 above).

C.9. In respect of all aspects of case management, comparative study of other states' experience offers valuable insights into specific procedural measures that may be introduced, a number of which are discussed in more details in the text above.

Criminal cases

C.10. Further studies ought to be encouraged in individual states which do not presently have any system of or equivalent to discretionary prosecution so as to give effect to Recommendation No. R (87) 18 (see paragraphs 73-77 above).

C.11. All countries should consider whether a system of sentence discount for a guilty plea might not bring benefits to their criminal justice. Any such plea must be in court and be taken by a judge. Lawyers should have a professional obligation to ensure that the plea of guilty is entered voluntarily and with the intention to admit each of the elements of the offence charged (see paragraphs 79- 89 above).

Civil cases

C.12. To comply with their duties under article 6 of the ECHR to ensure "a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time", states should provide adequate resources and courts should conduct individual cases in a manner which is fair and proportionate as between the particular parties and takes into account the interests of other litigants and the public generally; that means conducting such litigation in a manner that enables the parties thereto to obtain justice at a cost commensurate with the issues involved, the amounts at stake and (without prejudice to the state's duty to provide appropriate resources) the court's own resources and that enables other litigants to obtain their fair share of the court's time for their own disputes (see paragraphs 103-104 above).

C.13. The key to conducting litigation proportionately is active case management by judges, the core principles of which are stated in Recommendation No. R (84) 5. The most important point is that judges should from the outset and throughout legal proceedings control the timetable and duration of proceedings, setting firm dates and having power to refuse adjournments, even against the parties' wishes (see paragraphs 90-102 above).

C.14. Parties should be required to define and commit themselves to their cases and evidence at an early stage, and judges should have power, both at first instance and on any appeal, to exclude amendments and/or new material after that stage (see paragraphs 122-125 above).

C.15. States should introduce (a) effective protective measures, (b) summary, simplified and/or abbreviated procedures and (c) procedures for early determination of preliminary issues (including jurisdictional issues) and for the speedy resolution of any appeal in respect of such preliminary issues (see paragraphs 111-131 above).

C.16. Court judgments should be immediately enforceable, notwithstanding any appeal, subject to provision of security where appropriate to protect the losing party in the event of a successful appeal (see paragraphs 129-130 above).

C.17. Countries should give consideration to the possibility of introducing into their systems controls on unmeritorious appeals, in order to ensure that the speedy disposition of meritorious appeals is not impaired (see paragraph 138 above).

D. Alternative dispute resolution (ADR)

D.1. It is necessary to encourage the development of ADR schemes and to increase public awareness of their existence, the way they operate and their cost (see paragraph 141 above).

D.2. Legal aid should be available for ADR as it is for standard court proceedings; both legal aid resources as well as any other public expenditures to support ADR should make use of a special budget, so that the corresponding expenses are not charged to the operating budget of the courts (see paragraph 142 above).

D.3. Although, unlike ADR in civil matters, criminal mediation is not useful to alleviate the current workload of the court system, it may have a preventative effect in respect of future crimes; since Recommendation No. R (99) 19 concentrates solely on "mediation" between offender and victim, there is a need for further research on the broader concept of "restorative justice", i.e. procedures allowing diversion from the normal criminal process before it starts (soon after arrest), after it has started as part of the sentencing process or even during the execution of punishment; since schemes for restorative justice require more careful implementation than ADR in civil disputes, as bringing victims and offenders into contact is a much more sensitive process than bringing two parties to a civil dispute together, the success of such schemes depends in part on a cultural change for criminal justice practitioners used to the normal trial and punishment model of justice (see paragraphs 146-149 above).

D.4. Recourse to mediation, in civil and administrative proceedings, may be chosen on the parties' initiative or, alternatively, the judge should be allowed to recommend it; the parties should be allowed to refuse recourse to mediation; such a refusal should not infringe the party's right to have his/her case decided (see paragraphs 150-152 above).

D.5. In criminal mediation, if a criminal case is diverted from the normal prosecution process after it has started, it should require an order of a judge; all restorative justice arrangements (or, if appropriate, those that are more than mere warnings with no legal relevance) should have the formality of judicial approval (see paragraphs 151-152 above).

D.6. Information provided during mediation operations in civil and administrative disputes should be confidential; confidentiality may be lifted in the event of an agreement between the parties; it is open to question whether and how far the judge may consider refusal to access mediation or to accept a friendly settlement when making orders relating to trial expenses or costs (see paragraphs 154-156 above).

D.7. Confidentiality should also apply to ADR in criminal matters, especially in those countries where prosecution is obligatory. This poses the problem of what should be the consequences of admission of other offences on the part of the offender or of persons who are not participating in the mediation process (see paragraph 157 above).

D.8. Both in criminal and civil-administrative matters, ADR schemes should be closely associated with the court system; appropriate legal provisions or court practice should confer the judge the power to direct the parties to appear before a judicially appointed, trained mediator, who may prove possession of relevant skills and qualifications, as well as of the necessary impartiality and independence for such a public service (see paragraphs 157-159 and 161 above).

D.9. Judges may act as mediators themselves, since this allows judicial know-how to be placed at the disposal of the public; it is nevertheless essential to preserve their impartiality in particular by providing that they will perform this task in disputes other than those they are required to hear and decide (see paragraph 161 above).

D.10. ADR settlement agreements should be subject to confirmation by the judge, particularly where enforcement measures have to be considered; in this case the judge must enjoy substantial supervisory powers, particularly concerning respect for equality between the parties, the reality of their consent to the measures provided for by the agreement and respect for the law and for public policy; as for specific aspects concerning criminal mediation, further guarantees should apply (see paragraphs 162-164 above).

APPENDIX VEXPLANATORY NOTE AND QUESTIONNAIRE ON THE THEME “JUSTICE AND SOCIETY”

prepared by the Chair of the CCJE-GT

INTRODUCTION

1. In 2005 the Consultative Council of European Judges (CCJE) has the task¹⁹ of adopting an opinion on "justice and society" for the attention of the Committee of Ministers.

2. In this regard, the CCJE proposed that the following points which appear in the Framework Global Action Plan for Judges in Europe be considered:

- the educational role of the courts in a democracy, relations with the public (see Part V b of the Action Plan);
- relations with all those involved in court proceedings (see Part V c of the Action Plan);
- accessibility, simplification and clarity of the language used by the courts in proceedings and decisions (see Part V d of the Action Plan);

3. This work will be carried out on the basis of:

- replies by delegations to a questionnaire;
- a report prepared by a specialist;
- the contributions of participants in the 2nd European Conference of Judges on the theme of "Justice and the Media", organised by the Council of Europe on the initiative of the Consultative Council of European Judges (CCJE) in co-operation with the Polish National Judicial Council and with the support of the Polish Ministry of Justice, taking place in Cracow (Poland) on 25 and 26 April 2005;
- a draft opinion to be prepared by the Secretariat and the Working Party of the CCJE in 2005.

4. The present text contains the questionnaire mentioned above.

5. In 2004, on the initiative of the Chair of the CCJE, the questionnaire, prepared by the Vice-Chair of the CCJE, was accompanied by an explanatory note to be used as a basis for discussion.

6. In view of the need for both the questionnaire and the explanatory note to be circulated well before the deadline for completion and thus better respond to the needs of the delegations of the CCJE, the present text referring to the 2005 activities will be submitted directly to the CCJE plenary meeting taking place in Strasbourg on 22-24 November 2004.

7. The explanatory note is worded to provide a separate introduction to each of the sections into which the questionnaire has been subdivided. This will help respondents deal in detail with all the implications of the questions asked (in italics) as they appear in the explanatory note.

8. Answers to the questionnaire should be accompanied by relevant documentation. Some specific items of documentation that may be useful are mentioned in paragraph 35 below.

A. THE EDUCATIONAL ROLE OF THE COURTS IN A DEMOCRACY.

9. Judicial decisions play a relevant role in democratic societies. Judicial decisions have an added value: if, on one hand, they settle disputes concerning individuals, on the other hand they play an "educational role" as they provide citizens with relevant information as to the application of the law in practice.

10. Courts are, and are accepted by the public at large as being, the proper forum for the ascertainment of legal rights and obligations and the settlement of disputes relative thereto; the public at large have respect for and confidence in the courts' capacity to fulfil that function.²⁰

11. More and more, however, countries have to face social attitudes, reflecting general tensions in modern democracies, expressing distrust in the courts, as well as the view that judges do not always reflect the will of the people.

12. In general, it is argued that although the courts exist to serve the people, the judge's duty is to apply the law in a fair and even-handed manner is little known. Adequate information about the functions of the judiciary and their mission, even when other state powers are involved, can effectively contribute toward an increased understanding of the courts as the cornerstone of democratic constitutional systems, as well as of the limits of their activities.

13. Furthermore, most citizens' knowledge of their court system is limited to their experiences as litigants, witnesses, or jurors. This implies, on one hand, that the role of the media is essential in broadcasting information to the public on the role and the activities of the courts (see section C.2 below); on the other hand, it is also crucial that the judiciary itself, by in some way widening and improving the scope of its "educational role" as described above, which is no longer limited to delivering decisions, fills the function of communicator and facilitator, bridging the gap between citizens' expectations and the courts' mission.

14. If courts so far have accepted to participate in educational programmes to which they might have been invited, it is perhaps high time to abandon such an old approach ("If we're asked we'll go, but we're not often asked") and to view courts as the principal promoters of "court literacy" for the general public.

15. For example, courts have been known to organise, often with the support of other social actors, educational initiatives that bring teachers, students, parents, lawyers, community leaders and the media into the courts to interact with judges and the justice system ("outreach programmes"). Such programmes usually incorporate the use of professionals with prepared resources and provide a network for teachers' professional development.

²⁰ See, e.g., ECHR, Sunday Times (No. 1), 55, where the notions mentioned in the text are said to be included in the phrase "authority of the judiciary" contained in art. 10 of the Convention.

16. The CCJE might be interested in learning about such experiences and may recommend the general support of the European judiciaries and the Council of Europe for some similar initiatives.

Questions

A.1. Please describe arrangements existing in your country aiming at informing justice users and/or the general public about the functioning of the judicial system. Please describe the specific information provided (nature of proceedings available; average length of proceedings in the various courts; costs and risks involved in case of wrongful use of legal channels; alternative means of settling disputes offered to parties; landmark decisions delivered by the courts) as well as the press resources used (printed citizen's guides, Internet facilities, information offices, etc.). Please also state which authorities provide such services, underlining the role of the courts themselves and/or of lawyers' associations (see paragraphs 12-15 of the CCJE's Opinion No. 6 (2004) on Fair Trial within a Reasonable Time and Judge's Role in Trials taking into Account Alternative Means of Dispute Settlement). Please say whether a role is played by judges' professional associations and/or by the Judicial Service Commission/High Council for the Judiciary. Please say whether public interest organisations and universities have a role in the above.

A.2. Please describe the systems envisaged to satisfy the information needs of policy makers, academics, public interest groups and private citizens.

A.3. Please describe specifically the educational role of judicial decisions in your country. Please describe how judicial decisions are made known to the general public and how accurate such information is. Please consider that what is relevant is information provided to the public and not to legal professionals. Please also consider that the role of the press will be dealt with in a subsequent section (C.2) of this questionnaire.

A.4. Please say whether school and university education programmes in your country (even outside law faculties) include a description of the judicial system and visits to courts. Please specify outside actors that are employed by educational institutions (e.g. in classroom appearances) to provide programmes (judges, court staff, academics, lawyers, non-governmental organisations). Please say whether courts have staff specifically in charge of liaising with educational agencies (P.R. offices or the like). Please describe educational methods (e.g., role playing, attending hearings, etc.).

A.5. Please say whether courts in general, or some courts, have "outreach programmes" (see above) or at least regular programmes consisting in conducting surveys, holding focus groups, employing lawyers and academics for public forums, etc.

A.6. Please provide relevant information (e.g. summarising contents) as to theoretical studies existing in your country in the above mentioned field(s).

B. THE RELATIONS OF THE COURTS WITH THOSE INVOLVED IN COURT PROCEEDINGS

17. Individuals that do not belong to legal professions often come into direct contact with court proceedings when they are litigants, witnesses, experts, jurors, etc. Although the role of the media in shaping the public opinion is most relevant, the impressions of citizens as they participate in proceedings in the above roles is also a key element which establishes the image of justice in society.

18. If people, and especially litigants, involved in court proceedings feel that judges or court staff show, for example, racial or gender bias and/or that the trial in which they are involved suffers from unjustified delay, the perception of those citizens will easily spread.

19. It might be argued that there is little room for action by the court system itself in this field: it is the culture of a specific society at a certain historical stage that determines the role of the judiciary; beyond that, it is self-evident, and it is inherent in the concept of litigation, that there always will be dissatisfied litigants, who will view a certain decision (and consequently a certain judge, or a group of judges, or the court system as a whole) as being unfair or even biased.

20. Such objections may be well-founded; nonetheless the CCJE might consider that, for the sake of contributing to a better understanding of the role of the judiciary, action is necessary to ensure that, in so far as possible, the image of justice perceived by individuals involved in court proceedings is accurate and that it corresponds to the efforts of judges and court staff to win respect for and confidence in the courts' capacity to fulfil their functions.

21. In order to improve relations with those involved in court proceedings, several court systems or individual courts have developed programmes that have an impact on:

a) Training of judges, lawyers and court staff; training in deontology

There have been programmes aiming to ensure that, in verbal and non-verbal communication, courts appear to treat all litigants equally, impartially, and without regard to race, gender, ethnicity, or socio-economic status. Judges and court personnel are instructed to recognise situations that, even on the level of appearance, might create in an individual a perception of a prejudiced attitude, and are trained to deal with such situations in a way that reinforces confidence and respect for the judge. Lawyers receive specific training in deontology, aimed at ensuring that they do not reinforce, either intentionally or unintentionally, by verbal or non-verbal communication, attitudes of distrust in the court system.

b) Court infra-structures

Some programmes are aimed at removing causes of distrust in the courts, that may lie in the infra-structural organisation of courts. For example, in some cases, removing the stall for the public prosecutor from the vicinity of the court's bench, and placing it at the same level as the place for the defence lawyer might have reinforced the image of equality of arms; removing references to a specific religious creed from the court scene might have reduced the fear of a religious bias; ordering that the accused person appear free before the judge, even if in detention, and substituting other safety measures for the presence of enclosures in the courtroom, might have reinforced the image of presumption of innocence.

c) Court procedure

Some actions are aimed at removing some traditional procedural steps and language that might be wrongly perceived (oaths, ways of addressing people, etc.). Some other actions introduce procedures providing that, before a court appearance, litigants or witness, are met individually or in groups, by court officers who offer oral or audio-visual presentations, developed in co-operation with social scientists, on how their court experience is likely to develop; the goal of such presentations is to prevent false perceptions of court life.

d) Access to justice programmes

Some actions are tailored for individuals who, because of their socio-economical and cultural conditions, are not completely aware of their rights and obligations, so that they do not exert their rights or, worse still, find themselves involved in legal proceedings due to not carrying out their obligations. The image of justice in the neediest social groups is therefore dealt with through "access to justice" programmes, that include, but are not limited to, legal aid (public information services, free legal counsel, direct access to the judge for petty claims, etc. - see section A of the CCJE's Opinion No. 6 (2004) on Fair Trial within a Reasonable Time and Judge's Role in Trials taking into Account Alternative Means of Dispute Settlement)

Questions

B.1. Please provide detailed information on programmes with the above mentioned objectives being carried out or planned in your court system.

B.2. Please describe who takes part in programmes.

B.3. Please provide relevant information (e.g. summarising contents) as to theoretical studies existing in your country in the above mentioned field(s).

C. THE RELATIONS OF THE COURTS WITH THE PUBLIC

i. DIRECT RELATIONS OF THE COURTS WITH THE PUBLIC

22. Whereas relations with individual justice users have traditionally been dealt with by the courts, albeit in an unstructured way, courts have been reluctant to have direct relations with the members of the general public who are not involved in proceedings. Publicity of hearings in the sense enshrined in Art. 6 of the ECHR has been traditionally viewed as the sole contact between courts and the general public.

23. Such an attitude - which implied a passive role of courts in the public arena, in conformity with a traditional conception of the duties of impartiality and discretion, and made the mass media the sole interlocutors for courts - is rapidly changing (see para. 5 above).

24. The CCJE should investigate what form of direct contact with the public, i.e. not passing through journalistic mediation, is necessary and/or desirable.

25. The following examples could be considered:

- creation of P.R. offices in courts;
- distribution of printed materials, opening of Internet sites;
- organisation of a calendar of educational forums and/or regular meetings open to citizens, public interest organisations, policy makers, etc.

Questions

C.1. Please provide detailed information on programmes with the above mentioned objectives, being carried out or planned in your court system:

C.2. Please describe who takes part in such programmes.

C.3. Please provide relevant information (e.g. summarising contents) as to theoretical studies existing in your country in the above mentioned field(s).

ii. INDIRECT RELATIONS OF THE COURTS WITH THE PUBLIC - JUSTICE AND THE MEDIA

26. The 2nd European Conference of Judges to be held in Cracow (Poland) on 25 and 26 April 2005 on the theme of "Justice and the Media" will certainly provide relevant materials to guide the CCJE's preparation of what appears to be the "core" subject of the CCJE's 2005 Opinion, i.e. the indirect relations of the court system with the public, by way of journalistic mediation. Since the conference will be open to media representatives, parliamentarians, representatives of interested international organisations and experts on the questions under discussion, the CCJE will have the possibility to collect various points of view.

27. The CCJE's future Opinion should try to recommend actions, on the part of the States and specifically of the judiciaries, that would help, on the basis of the principles elaborated by the European Court of Human Rights,²¹ reconcile protection of freedom of expression and the right to information, on the one hand, and the right to a fair trial, protection of private life, reputation and human dignity and the presumption of innocence, on the other. Reference must be made mainly to Articles 6, 8 and 10 of the ECHR.

28. A first section of the "justice and the media" chapter of the future Opinion may consequently deal with the fundamental aspects of relations among the potentially conflicting values protected by the European Convention on Human Rights.

29. On such an essentially theoretical subject, the specialist's report will be a sufficient basis for the CCJE's work. Thus, it is not necessary to ask the delegations further questions.

30. A second section of the "justice and the media" chapter of the future Opinion might:

- compare national regulations and practices concerning access by journalists to judicial information and the public presentation of such information;
- describe relationships between judges and journalists in their day-to-day interactions;
- recommend "good practices" (to be implemented by judges and journalists, with possible involvement of professional organisations and/or media regulatory agencies and Judicial Service Commissions) that may strike a balance among conflicting values.

31. In order to make such work possible, a survey of the experiences of several systems is necessary, in order to pinpoint the relevant differences.

²¹ A basic reference list of case law of the European Court of Human Rights concerning most subjects dealt with in section C.2. of the Explanatory Note and Questionnaire may include (in alphabetical order): Allenet De Ribemont v. France; Amihalachioaie v. Moldova; B. v. the United Kingdom and P. v. the United Kingdom; Barfod v. Denmark; De Haes and Gijssels v. Belgium; Du Roy and Malaurie v. France; Gaskin v. the United Kingdom; Hrico v. Slovakia; Observer and Guardian v. the United Kingdom; Perna v. Italy; Prager and Oberschlick v. Austria; Sunday Times v. the United Kingdom.

Questions

C.4. Please describe existing restrictions to the right to information in the field of judicial (civil, administrative, criminal) activity. Please describe the norms concerning secrecy of judicial investigations and/or other norms preventing dissemination of information on the development of a judicial case (e.g. secrecy of witness depositions, of filing a civil party suit within a criminal case, etc.). Please clarify at what stage in proceedings judicial information may be made public. Please also say if there is law or court practice preventing dissemination of names (or pictures) of persons involved in the case (parties, witnesses, public prosecutor, investigating judge, trial judge, etc.).

C.5. Please provide any information you deem useful as to the implementation of:

C.5.1 The Convention for the Protection of Individuals with regard to Automatic Processing of Personal Data (ETS No. 108);

C.5.2. Recommendation Rec(2002)2 of the Committee of Ministers to member States on access to public documents;

C.5.3. Recommendation Rec(2003)13 on the provision of information through the media in relation to criminal proceedings, and Council of Europe instruments mentioned therein.

C.6. What are the procedures, if any, that guarantee access to information and access by journalists to court hearings and judicial files? Please make appropriate references to existing regulations on this matter. Do courts have spokespersons? Are they judges? Are judges allowed, by regulations and/or by deontological rules, to make statements to the press? If so, under what circumstances?

C.7. Are television cameras allowed into the courtrooms? If so, what rules should govern the broadcasting of the recorded TV images in order to prevent the risk of manipulation?

32. Another approach the CCJE should take in preparing the future Opinion should concern the role played by judicial authorities in the supervision of media activities in a State governed by the Rule of Law. In a third section of the "justice and the media" chapter of the Opinion, the CCJE might therefore examine potential judicial procedures enabling judges to supervise the media vis-à-vis case-law of the European Court of Human Rights and national legislation and practices.

33. Specifically, one should consider the implications of:

- protection of human dignity and freedom of expression;
- protection of fundamental rights of the person, vis-à-vis the journalist's responsibility in cases where incorrect information is provided;
- the role of protective and compensatory measures in cases involving protection of private life.

34. Although some of the above topics are theoretical, in order that the specialist's report forms a sufficient basis for the CCJE's work, an overview is needed as preparatory work when dealing with some other aspects of delegations' experiences.

Questions

C.8. In the light of national law and case-law, please describe criminal and civil implications of libel, slander, and/or similar violations of a person's reputation. Please give information about penalties provided for by law or judicial practice, as for criminal law, with special reference to violations committed by journalists. Are there different thresholds for responsibility, e.g. for public figures and for private individuals? If so, is there, however, protection for private life of public figures, and under what circumstances?

C.9. What degree of professional diligence and integrity is requested from journalists? What criteria govern the distinction between lawful and unlawful acts, if the information provided is false? Are there differences between facts reported as such or the uttering of mere opinions? Is the fact that information comes from a qualified source (e.g. a police officer) an element that permits disclosure in any case or at least exempts the journalist from verification? What precautions are requested in the broadcasting, e.g., news concerning provisional arrest of a citizen on the basis of criminal charges? Do police officers and/or prosecution offices and/or investigating judges hold press conferences? If so, what are the procedures?

C.10. Please provide information as to the amount of compensation afforded by courts to the victims of the above violations. Are there established criteria? Do such criteria depend on the social status of the person in question?

C.11. What is the legal regime of rectification of inaccurate information? Is spontaneous rectification such that criminal liability is excluded, or compensation diminished?

C.12. Please describe protective measures available, respectively within criminal and civil procedures (e.g. seizure of publications, order not to distribute a book, etc.). Are there measures in your system that are or might be considered as a form of preventive censorship? Is there a role for the executive branch in supervising the media?

C.13. In the event that a judge or a court is attacked by the press for reasons connected with the administration of justice, is there a role for the Judicial Service Commission and/or judicial associations? Is the judge bound by a duty of discretion even if a press campaign has been started attacking him or her?

35. In order for the 2nd European Conference of Judges taking place in Cracow, Poland, on 25-26 April 2005 on the theme of "Justice and the Media", as well as for the preparation of the CCJE's Opinion, to be prepared in the most accurate way, national delegations are also kindly requested to append to their answers to the questionnaire:

- national legislation on access to information, journalists' access to court hearings and files, and the statutory foundation of journalists' liability;
- relevant national case-law on freedom of expression, protection of private life and human dignity;
- statements of "good practices" implemented at national level with a view to improving relations between justice and the media.

D. ACCESSIBILITY, SIMPLIFICATION AND CLARITY OF THE LANGUAGE USED BY THE COURTS IN PROCEEDINGS AND DECISIONS

36. The language of court decisions is not only a powerful tool available to the courts to fulfil their educational role (see paragraph 3 above), but it is obviously, and more directly, the "law in practice" for the specific litigants of the case. Accessibility, simplification and clarity of the language of courts is therefore necessary.

37. Substantial research already exists on the language used in court decisions, on a comparative law basis. However, it is essential that in its 2005 Opinion the CCJE expresses the judges' views on this topic.

38. The CCJE could, for example:

- recommend that legislation concerning reasoning of judgments provide that some form of reasoning should always exist, and that sufficient discretion is left to the judge in choosing whether to adopt an oral judgement (to be transcribed from a recording only upon request and in case of need) and/or a short written reasoned judgment (e.g. in the shape of the "attendu" style decision adopted in France) or an extensive written reasoned judgment, in all those cases in which reference to established precedents is not possible and/or the factual reasoning so requires;

- recommend that simplified forms of reasoning apply to orders, writs, decrees and other decisions that have a procedural value and do not concern the substantive rights of the parties;

- recommend that all decisions be concise and make use of plain language, avoiding Latin or other wordings that are difficult to understand if not necessary, and that the functions of legal institutes referred to be explained briefly, if necessary.

- recommend that all court decisions be readily accessible through Internet sites, and in print upon reimbursement of the cost of reproduction only.

Questions

D.1. Due to the fact that most of the problems involved are of a theoretical nature, delegations are only requested to describe the prevailing attitude in the national legal community about conciseness of judgements (e.g., in some countries, judges believe that very short judgments reinforce the authority of the judgement; in some other countries, judges feel obliged, or are obliged by the law, to adequately explain in writing, for example, the criteria and calculations adopted to award damages or to make orders related to costs).

D.2. Please provide relevant information (e.g. summarising contents) as to theoretical studies existing in your country in the above mentioned field(s).

APPENDIX VI2nd European Conference of Judges
Justice and the media

Cracow, 25-26 April 2005

NOTES ON THE CONFERENCE

I. Introduction

The 2nd European Conference of Judges will be held on 25 and 26 April 2005 in Cracow (Poland) during the Polish Chairmanship of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe. It is being organised by the Council of Europe at the instigation of the Consultative Council of European Judges (CCJE)²², in collaboration with the Polish National Council of Justice and with the assistance of the Polish Ministry of Justice. The Conference will be on the theme of “Justice and the media”.

It is associated with the implementation of the framework global action plan for judges in Europe, adopted by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe at its 740th meeting (7 February 2001). The aim of the framework plan is to strengthen the role of judges in Europe and to provide the Committee of Ministers with information on important questions of concern to judges in the member states.

The Conference is open to judges and all persons professional concerned with its topic, namely media representatives, parliamentarians, representatives of international organisations interested, and experts in the matters discussed.

II. Presentation of the Conference1. Aims of the Conference

The Conference is intended to help strengthen the principles of rule of law and enhance protection of human rights by identifying approaches which States can apply in order to strike a balance in the relationship between justice and the media.

It also seeks to furnish information which the CCJE will bear in mind when it draws up its Opinion on the theme: “Justice and Society” in 2005 in accordance with its specific terms of reference.

Thus the Conference should come up with answers to a series of questions, so as to arrive at principles for reconciling protection of the right of expression and the right to knowledge with the rights to a fair hearing, to protection of privacy, reputation and human dignity, and to the presumption of innocence. Should the right to knowledge be limited by the secrecy of judicial investigation? Is a reform of justice necessary in order to ensure the transparency of information? How can one contrive to strike a proper balance between public freedoms and citizens' rights having regard to the requirements of the European Convention on Human Rights and given that the citizens claiming the right to be informed are equally desirous of guarantees for protection of their privacy?

2. Themes to be developed during the Conference

A. Publicity of justice

The increasing societal demand to be informed concerning the foundations of judicial decisions is a phenomenon linked with the growth of citizens' democratic awareness. It behoves the courts to take account of this by displaying openness, with due care to preserve the impartiality of the decisions delivered in accordance with the requirements of the European Convention on Human Rights.

i. The judge and the media – the journalist in court: the image of justice in society

A free, critical press and a transparent, independent judicial system are both guardians of rule of law. These two pillars of democracy have differing functions.

Under this theme, participants will discuss the effects of media exposure of justice on its perception in society.

ii. Publicity of hearings and media access

Under this theme, participants will discuss the fundamental question of how to reconcile the right to freedom of expression and information with the right to a fair trial. Reference will be made especially to the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights. Information on the application in the member states of Recommendation Rec (2003) 13 on the provision of information through the media in relation to criminal proceedings would be a useful asset to the debate.

iii. Proceedings in private and limits to media access to information

Under this theme, participants will examine the question of access to information and journalists' access to hearings and to court files having regard to the regulatory devices which exist in member states in this area. They will look into ways of securing the transparency of judicial proceedings which is necessary in a democratic society.

Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights secures to the public the right to receive information of public interest. As the media perform a particularly important role in the delivery of information to the public, they should be able to disseminate information on the activities of the courts. To fulfil this function, should the media have unlimited access to court files? At which stage of the proceedings should information on their progress be public? Should the introduction of the televised press into court rooms be authorised? If so, which rules should govern the conditions of circulation of recordings in order to avert risks of manipulation?

If the media are admitted to public hearings and deliveries of judgments, which arrangements should the courts make to fulfil the requirements of Article 10, while upholding the safeguards of Article 6 ECHR? What should be the role of the judge's statutory duty of discretion in this context?

- iv. Round table: convergences and divergences in the relations between justice and the media

Under this theme, participants will discuss possible avenues to be established for improving relations between judges and journalists. They will describe good practices in this respect in their countries. Clarity of the grounds stated for judgments, training and the role of a court spokesperson and of the judicial service commission will receive specific mention in the debate.

B. Freedom of the media and protection of individuals

Confronted with growing media intervention, the courts are compelled to take care of the necessary balance between freedom of information and respect for privacy or the presumption of innocence. Participants will analyse the means available to justice for protecting individuals in this context.

- i. Respect for human dignity and private and family life

In the light of national case-law, participants will seek answers to questions that arise in connection with defamation proceedings, for instance: does the level of protection of the right to respect for privacy and human dignity depend on the individual's social status? How can we ascertain individuals' threshold of sensitivity to criticisms or attacks by the press? Reference will be made to the Convention for the Protection of Individuals with regard to Automatic Processing of Personal Data (ETS 108).

- ii. Freedom of thought and expression

Under this topic participants will look into the balance to be found between the principle of transparency and the protection of human dignity as well as the limits to the disclosure of confidential information, in order to secure the individual rights or to maintain the authority and impartiality of the judiciary. Reference will be made especially to the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights.

- iii. Preventive measures and media liability for damages in case of infringement of private rights

Participants will look into the statutory foundation of journalists' liability for release of incorrect information about an individual (criminal or civil liability?). Where a journalist, acting with full professional diligence and rectitude, releases an inaccurate piece of information, can he/she be guilty of violating personality rights? Is the journalist's action then contrary to law? In the light of the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights, what is the journalist's liability for the release of inaccurate information, depending whether it relates to the facts or to his/her opinions? How does the law governing the press regulate liability in these cases? Is it possible to demand publication, and if so subject to what time limits, of a rectification of inaccurate information?

Recourse to precautionary measures (before publication of the text at issue) and compensatory measures (after publication of the text) is a way of protecting privacy. Participants will share their experience regarding the application of these measures. They will look into the role performed by these measures and, in particular, consider the question whether these measures can be regarded as preventive censorship in cases concerning protection of privacy.

- iv. Panel discussion: working together to protect human rights and fundamental freedoms more effectively

In order to discover the reasons for the misunderstandings, or even mistrust between judges and journalists, and to offer a meeting-point where each side would be able, without dishonouring its own special characteristics, to acknowledge the other side's logic, a panel discussion will provide an opportunity for the discussion group made up of representatives of the two professions to express mutual expectations and criticisms.

3. Working methods

The Conference proceedings will be conducted in plenary sessions.

The first day will focus on the publicity of justice. Three themes discussed through this day will be introduced by the rapporteurs and followed by general debate. Proceedings will concentrate on comparison of national regulations and practices concerning journalists' access to judicial information, and its presentation to the public, as well on the difficulties encountered by judges and journalists in their day-to-day relations.

This part of the proceedings will be followed by a round table during which all participants will be invited to present good practices established in their countries in order to foster understanding between judges and journalists with the aim of supplying the public with accurate information.

The second day will focus on protection of individuals. Its activities are intended to stimulate exchange of ideas between the rapporteurs and the participants about the basic questions of a linkage between the values protected by the Convention.

Three themes will be introduced by rapporteurs and followed by general debate. The case-law of the European Court of Human Rights and national legislation and practice will provide the basis for discussion.

This will be followed by a panel discussion in which judges and journalists will take part.

After the close of the proceedings and the presentation of a consolidated report, the participants will adopt the Conference conclusions.

Persons wishing secure an opportunity to contribute to the discussions are invited to enter their names on the list of speakers by sending an e-mail to the following address: ccje@coe.int by 20 April 2005. It will be possible to speak impromptu within the limits of the timetabling of the debate. Oral statements should not exceed 5 minutes.

In order to give the discussions the requisite substantive basis, the organisers wish to produce a consolidated document founded on the national reports, containing relevant information on the themes set out in the programme, with particular attention to the following questions:

- the application of Recommendation Rec (2003) 13 on the provision of information through the media in relation to criminal proceedings,
- the application of Recommendation Rec (2002) 2 on access to official documents;
- national legislation on access to information, journalists' access to hearings and court files, the statutory foundation of journalists' liability,
- relevant national case-law on freedom of expression, protection of privacy and human dignity,
- best national practice for the enhancement of relations between justice and the media.

Participants are accordingly invited to prepare written statements of approximately four pages, the main points of which they can present orally, if so desired, during the proceedings. The statements, in English or French, should be sent before 15 March 2005 by e-mail to the Secretariat of the Consultative Council of European Judges (CCJE) at the following address: ccje@coe.int.

Participants are also invited to identify the problems and work out proposed solutions to be adopted for achieving balance in relations between justice and the media.

The principal problems brought up in the debate will be duly reflected in the consolidated report and taken into consideration for the formulation of the Conference conclusions.

The working languages will be English, French and Polish.
