All parents want to be a good mother or a good father to their children. Yet parenting, besides being a joyous and rewarding experience, can also be a stressful one. Most parents have found themselves in situations where they would have welcomed help, not only in overcoming stress and controlling anger, but also in making everyday decisions. Other parents need specific attention because they are raising their children in difficult social, economic or personal circumstances. It is a challenging responsibility to raise children and create the conditions necessary for them to develop their potential to the fullest.

While parenting is in many respects private, it is also a legitimate domain of public policy. Public authorities should create structures and services that enable parents to learn and practise good parenting skills. This would be a major step towards laying the groundwork for genuinely positive parenting.

The Council of Europe has always been a forerunner in furthering understanding of childhood and family life experiences. Based on its wide experience and fully acknowledging that there are many different ways to raise children, it has drawn up a set of general principles that underlie the concept of positive parenting as well as guidelines on how policy makers can support it. The reference document for the Council of Europe’s work in this area is Committee of Ministers Recommendation (2006)19 on policy to support positive parenting.

Council of Europe legal instruments related to family policy and children’s rights

The importance that the Council of Europe attaches to families and children is reflected in its wide range of legal instruments.

Council of Europe conventions
- The European Convention on Human Rights and the European Social Charter are two of the fundamental texts that guarantee the right to respect for private and family life.
- The European Charter on Children’s Rights, which fully recognizes the autonomy of the private sphere, describes the family as a fundamental social unit and refers to the right to appropriate social, legal and economic protection.
- The European Convention on the Exercise of Children’s Rights Alone or with Children, to ensure their rights in family proceedings before a judicial authority.
- The European Convention on the Protection of Children against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse is the first international treaty that identifies and criminalises sexual abuse of children.

Committee of Ministers recommendations
- Recommendation (2006)19 on policy to support positive parenting encourages states to recognize the importance of parental responsibilities and the need to provide parents with sufficient support in bringing up their children. Member states are recommended to take all appropriate legislative, administrative and financial measures to create the best possible conditions for positive parenting.
- Other recommendations set legal standards on coherent and integrated family policies, family mediation, child day care, and children’s participation in family and social life.

For a complete list of Council of Europe legal instruments and publications on positive parenting and children’s rights see: www.coe.int/children and www.coe.int/familypolicy

Policy to support positive parenting

All parents want to be a good mother or a good father to their children. Yet parenting, besides being a joyous and rewarding experience, can also be a stressful one. Most parents have found themselves in situations where they would have welcomed help, not only in overcoming stress and controlling anger, but also in making everyday decisions. Other parents need specific attention because they are raising their children in difficult social, economic or personal circumstances. It is a challenging responsibility to raise children and create the conditions necessary for them to develop their potential to the fullest.

While parenting is in many respects private, it is also a legitimate domain of public policy. Public authorities should create structures and services that enable parents to learn and practise good parenting skills. This would be a major step towards laying the groundwork for genuinely positive parenting.

The Council of Europe has always been a forerunner in furthering understanding of childhood and family life experiences. Based on its wide experience and fully acknowledging that there are many different ways to raise children, it has drawn up a set of general principles that underlie the concept of positive parenting as well as guidelines on how policy makers can support it. The reference document for the Council of Europe’s work in this area is Committee of Ministers Recommendation (2006)19 on policy to support positive parenting.

About the Council of Europe

Founded in 1949, the Council of Europe is an international organization bringing together 47 member states to promote human rights, democracy and the rule of law. It seeks to develop common and democratic principles based on the European Convention on Human Rights and other reference texts on the protection of individuals, including children. A key priority of the Council of Europe is to promote social cohesion and social rights as a precondition for the genuine enjoyment of fundamental human rights and the respect for human dignity.

Council of Europe
F-67075 Strasbourg Cedex
www.coe.int/familypolicy
familypolicy@coe.int
Children need guidance to develop their potential to the fullest. Positive parenting means balancing family and professional life.

What does positive parenting actually mean?

Positive parenting refers to parental behaviour that respects children’s best interests and their rights, as set forth in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child – a convention which also takes into account parents’ needs and resources. The positive parent nurtures, empowers, guides and respects children as individuals in their own right. Positive parenting is not permissive parenting or the creation of boundaries that children need to help them develop their potential to the fullest. Positive parenting respects children’s rights and raises children in a non-violent environment.

Through family policy measures which:

- ensure appropriate living standards for families with children;
- prevent child poverty and social exclusion of families with children;
- enable parents to reconcile family and professional life;
- provide high quality care services for all children.

Parents need help in overcoming stress.

Through services to support parents such as:

- local centres and services dispensing information, counselling and training on parenting;
- spaces where parents can go to exchange experiences and learn from one another, and play with their children;
- educational programmes for parents, during pregnancy and other stages of the child’s development;
- help lines for both parents and children in a crisis situation;
- programmes to support children’s education, prevent school drop outs and promote cooperation between schools and parents;
- services targeting populations at risk such as migrant families, parents and children with disabilities, teenage parents or parents in difficult social and economic circumstances.

Through mainstreaming children’s rights in policymaking:

- incorporating children’s rights into all policies that will affect their lives;
- creating possibilities for children to make their opinions heard and participate in political decision-making on matters concerning them;
- establishing and supporting institutions to safeguard children’s rights, such as children’s ombudspersons.

Through awareness raising:

- ensuring comprehensive awareness of positive parenting among parents;
- encouraging, in particular, fathers to assume their share of responsibilities in caring for and rearing their children;
- ensuring that all professionals working with children (teachers, caregivers, educators, childminders, etc.) are provided with guidelines and training on how to practise and support positive parenting.

Learn more:

- Parenting in contemporary Europe: a positive approach, Council of Europe Publishing, 2007;

How can states support positive parenting?
Children need guidance to develop their potential to the fullest. Positive parenting means balancing family and professional life. What does positive parenting actually mean?

Children's rights make families grow. How can states support positive parenting?

Through family policy measures which:
- ensure appropriate living standards for families with children;
- prevent child poverty and social exclusion of families with children;
- enable parents to reconcile family and professional life;
- provide high quality care services for all children.

Parents need help in overcoming stress. Through services to support parents such as:
- local centres and services dispensing information, counselling and training on parenting;
- spaces where parents can go to exchange experiences and learn from one another, and play with their children;
- educational programmes for parents, during pregnancy and other stages of the child's development;
- help lines for both parents and children in a crisis situation;
- programmes to support children's education, prevent school drop outs and promote co-operation between schools and parents;
- services targeting populations at risk such as migrant families, parents and children with disabilities, teenage parents or parents in difficult social and economic circumstances.

Through mainstreaming children's rights in policymaking:
- incorporating children's rights into all policies that will affect their lives;
- creating possibilities for children to make their opinions heard and participate in political decision-making on matters concerning them;
- establishing and supporting institutions to safeguard children's rights, such as children's ombudspersons.

Through awareness raising:
- ensuring comprehensive awareness of positive parenting among parents;
- encouraging, in particular, fathers to assume their share of responsibilities in caring for and rearing their children;
- ensuring that all professionals working with children (teachers, caregivers, educators, childminders, etc.) are provided with guidelines and training on how to practise and support positive parenting.

Positive parenting can be learned. Positive parenting means balancing family and professional life. How can states support positive parenting?

Through services to support parents such as:
- local centres and services dispensing information, counselling and training on parenting;
- spaces where parents can go to exchange experiences and learn from one another, and play with their children;
- educational programmes for parents, during pregnancy and other stages of the child's development;
- help lines for both parents and children in a crisis situation;
- programmes to support children's education, prevent school drop outs and promote co-operation between schools and parents;
- services targeting populations at risk such as migrant families, parents and children with disabilities, teenage parents or parents in difficult social and economic circumstances.

Learn more:
- Parenting in contemporary Europe: a positive approach, Council of Europe Publishing, 2007;
- Eliminating corporal punishment – A human rights imperative for Europe's children, Council of Europe Publishing, 2006;

The concept of positive parenting is based on the following basic principles. Parents should provide their children with:
- Affection – responding to a child's need for love, warmth and security;
- Structure and guidance – providing a child with a sense of security, a predictable routine and necessary boundaries;
- Recognition – listening to children and valuing them as persons in their own right;
- Empowerment – enhancing a child's sense of competence and personal control;
- A non-violent upbringing – rejecting all corporal or psychologically demeaning punishment. Corporal punishment is a violation of children's rights to respect for physical integrity and human dignity.

In short, children do best when their parents:
- are warm and supportive;
- spend quality time with them;
- try to understand their life experiences and behaviour;
- explain the rules they are expected to follow;
- phrase good behaviour.

In short, children do best when their parents:
- are warm and supportive;
- spend quality time with them;
- try to understand their life experiences and behaviour;
- explain the rules they are expected to follow;
- praise good behaviour; react to misbehaviour with explanations of what is expected and how to do better, rather than with harsh punishment.

Positive parenting refers to parental behaviour that respects children, their needs and their rights, as set forth in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child – a convention which also takes into account parents' needs and resources. The positive parent nurtures, empowers, guides and respects children as individuals in their own right. Positive parenting is not permissive parenting it sets the boundaries that children need to help them develop their potential to the fullest. Positive parenting respects children's rights and raises children in a non-violent environment.

Positive parenting means balancing family and professional life.
Children need guidance to develop their potential to the fullest.

Positive parenting means balancing family and professional life.

What does positive parenting actually mean?

Children’s rights make families grow.

How can states support positive parenting?

Through family policy measures which:
- ensure appropriate living standards for families with children;
- prevent child poverty and social exclusion of families with children;
- enable parents to reconcile family and professional life;
- provide high quality care services for all children.

Parents need help in overcoming stress.

Through services to support parents such as:
- local centres and services dispensing information, counselling and training on parenting;
- spaces where parents can go to exchange experiences and learn from one another, and play with their children;
- educational programmes for parents, during pregnancy and other stages of the child’s development;
- help lines for both parents and children in a crisis situation;
- programmes to support children’s education, prevent school drop outs and promote cooperation between schools and parents;
- services targeting populations at risk such as migrant families, parents and children with disabilities, teenage parents or parents in difficult social and economic circumstances.

Learn more:
- Parenting in contemporary Europe: a positive approach, Council of Europe Publishing, 2007;
- Eliminating corporal punishment – A human rights imperative for Europe’s children, Council of Europe Publishing, 2006;

How can states support positive parenting?

Through mainstreaming children’s rights in policymaking:
- incorporating children’s rights into all policies that will affect their lives;
- creating possibilities for children to make their opinions heard and participate in political decision-making on matters concerning them;
- establishing and supporting institutions to safeguard children’s rights, such as children’s ombudspersons.

Through awareness raising:
- ensuring comprehensive awareness of positive parenting among parents;
- encouraging, in particular, fathers to assume their share of responsibilities in caring for and rearing their children;
- ensuring that all professionals working with children (teachers, caregivers, educators, childminders, etc.) are provided with guidelines and training on how to practice and support positive parenting.

In short, children do best when their parents:
- are warm and supportive;
- spend quality time with them;
- try to understand their life experiences and behaviour;
- explain the rules they are expected to follow;
- provide good behaviour;
- react to misbehaviour with explanations of rules, no cruel or unjust punishment such as “time-out”, deprivation of games, to play, pocket money, and so forth, rather than with harsh punishments.

Through services to support parents such as:
- local centres and services dispensing information, counselling and training on parenting;
- spaces where parents can go to exchange experiences and learn from one another, and play with their children;
- educational programmes for parents, during pregnancy and other stages of the child’s development;
- help lines for both parents and children in a crisis situation;
- programmes to support children’s education, prevent school drop outs and promote co-operation between schools and parents;
- services targeting populations at risk such as migrant families, parents and children with disabilities, teenage parents or parents in difficult social and economic circumstances.

Learn more:
- Parenting in contemporary Europe: a positive approach, Council of Europe Publishing, 2007;
- Eliminating corporal punishment – A human rights imperative for Europe’s children, Council of Europe Publishing, 2006;

Through awareness raising:
- ensuring comprehensive awareness of positive parenting among parents;
- encouraging, in particular, fathers to assume their share of responsibilities in caring for and rearing their children;
- ensuring that all professionals working with children (teachers, caregivers, educators, childminders, etc.) are provided with guidelines and training on how to practice and support positive parenting.

In short, children do best when their parents:
- are warm and supportive;
- spend quality time with them;
- try to understand their life experiences and behaviour;
- explain the rules they are expected to follow;
- provide good behaviour;
- react to misbehaviour with explanation and, if needed, non-violent punishment such as “time-out”, repairing damage, less pocket money and so forth, rather than with harsh punishments.

Positive parenting means balancing family and professional life.

Positive parenting refers to parental behaviour that respects children’s best interests and their rights, as set forth in the United Nations Convention on the rights of the Child – a convention which also takes into account parents’ needs and resources. The positive parent nurtures, empowers, guides and respects children as individuals in their own right. Positive parenting is not permissive parenting; it sets the boundaries that children need to help them develop their potential to the fullest. Positive parenting respects children’s rights and raises children in a non-violent environment.

The concept of positive parenting is based on the following basic principles.

Parents should provide their children with:
- Nurture – responding to a child’s need for love, warmth and security;
- Structure and guidance – providing a child with a sense of security, a predictable routine and necessary boundaries;
- Recognition – listening to children and valuing them as persons in their own right;
- Empowerment – enhancing a child’s sense of competence and personal control;
- A non-violent upbringing – including all corporal or psychologically demeaning punishment. Corporal punishment is a violation of children’s rights to respect for physical integrity and human dignity.

Positive parenting can be learned.

Positive parenting refers to parental behaviour that respects children’s best interests and their rights, as set forth in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child – a convention which also takes into account parents’ needs and resources. The positive parent nurtures, empowers, guides and respects children as individuals in their own right. Positive parenting is not permissive parenting; it sets the boundaries that children need to help them develop their potential to the fullest. Positive parenting respects children’s rights and raises children in a non-violent environment.

In short, children do best when their parents:
- are warm and supportive;
- spend quality time with them;
- try to understand their life experiences and behaviour;
- explain the rules they are expected to follow;
- provide good behaviour;
- react to misbehaviour with explanation and, if needed, non-violent punishment such as “time-out”, repairing damage, less pocket money and so forth, rather than with harsh punishments.

Learn more:
- Parenting in contemporary Europe: a positive approach, Council of Europe Publishing, 2007;
- Eliminating corporal punishment – A human rights imperative for Europe’s children, Council of Europe Publishing, 2006;

Through awareness raising:
- ensuring comprehensive awareness of positive parenting among parents;
- encouraging, in particular, fathers to assume their share of responsibilities in caring for and rearing their children;
- ensuring that all professionals working with children (teachers, caregivers, educators, childminders, etc.) are provided with guidelines and training on how to practice and support positive parenting.

In short, children do best when their parents:
- are warm and supportive;
- spend quality time with them;
- try to understand their life experiences and behaviour;
- explain the rules they are expected to follow;
- provide good behaviour;
- react to misbehaviour with explanation and, if needed, non-violent punishment such as “time-out”, repairing damage, less pocket money and so forth, rather than with harsh punishments.
All parents want to be a good mother or a good father to their children. Yet parenting, besides being a joyous and rewarding experience, can also be a stressful one. Most parents have found themselves in situations where they would have welcomed help, not only in overcoming stress and controlling anger, but also in making everyday decisions. Other parents need specific attention because they are raising their children in difficult social, economic or personal circumstances. It is a challenging responsibility to raise children and create the conditions necessary for them to develop their potential to the fullest.

While parenting is in many respects private, it is also a legitimate domain of public policy. Public authorities should create structures and services that enable parents to learn and practise good parenting skills. This would be a major step towards laying the groundwork for genuinely positive parenting.

The Council of Europe has always been a forerunner in furthering understanding of childhood and family life experiences. Based on its wide experience and fully acknowledging that there are many different ways to raise children, it has drawn up a set of general principles that underlie the concept of positive parenting as well as guidelines on how policy makers can support it. The reference document for the Council of Europe’s work in this area is Committee of Ministers Recommendation (2006)19 on policy to support positive parenting.

About the Council of Europe

Founded in 1949, the Council of Europe is an international organization bringing together 47 member states. It promotes the rule of law and the respect for human rights and democracy in Europe. Its activities cover all aspects of human rights and also include cultural, educational, social and legal issues. Its main tasks are to promote standards, to monitor the functioning of the European system of human rights protection and to contribute to the development of common values and cultural diversity in Europe.

The Council of Europe has adopted a number of recommendations to help states and local authorities promote good parenting. These include recommendations on coherent and integrated family policies, family mediation, child day care, and children’s participation in family and social life.

Policy to support positive parenting

All parents want to be a good mother or a good father to their children. Yet parenting, besides being a joyous and rewarding experience, can also be a stressful one. Most parents have found themselves in situations where they would have welcomed help, not only in overcoming stress and controlling anger, but also in making everyday decisions. Other parents need specific attention because they are raising their children in difficult social, economic or personal circumstances.

It is a challenging responsibility to raise children and create the conditions necessary for them to develop their potential to the fullest.

While parenting is in many respects private, it is also a legitimate domain of public policy. Public authorities should create structures and services that enable parents to learn and practise good parenting skills. This would be a major step towards laying the groundwork for genuinely positive parenting.

The Council of Europe has always been a forerunner in furthering understanding of childhood and family life experiences. Based on its wide experience and fully acknowledging that there are many different ways to raise children, it has drawn up a set of general principles that underlie the concept of positive parenting as well as guidelines on how policy makers can support it. The reference document for the Council of Europe’s work in this area is Committee of Ministers Recommendation (2006)19 on policy to support positive parenting.
All parents want to be a good mother or a good father to their children. Yet parenting, besides being a joyous and rewarding experience, can also be a stressful one. Most parents have found themselves in situations where they would have welcomed help, not only in overcoming stress and controlling anger, but also in making everyday decisions. Other parents need specific attention because they are raising their children in difficult social, economic or personal circumstances. It is a challenging responsibility to raise children and create the conditions necessary for them to develop their potential to the fullest.

While parenting is in many respects private, it is also a legitimate domain of public policy. Public authorities should create structures and services that enable parents to learn and practise good parenting skills. This would be a major step towards laying the groundwork for genuinely positive parenting.

The Council of Europe has always been a forerunner in furthering understanding of childhood and family life experiences. Based on its wide experience and fully acknowledging that there are many different ways to raise children, it has drawn up a set of general principles that underlie the concept of positive parenting as well as guidelines on how policy makers can support it. The reference document for the Council of Europe’s work in this area is Committee of Ministers Recommendation (2006)19 on policy to support positive parenting.

Policy to support positive parenting

All parents want to be a good mother or a good father to their children. Yet parenting, besides being a joyous and rewarding experience, can also be a stressful one. Most parents have found themselves in situations where they would have welcomed help, not only in overcoming stress and controlling anger, but also in making everyday decisions. Other parents need specific attention because they are raising their children in difficult social, economic or personal circumstances. It is a challenging responsibility to raise children and create the conditions necessary for them to develop their potential to the fullest.

While parenting is in many respects private, it is also a legitimate domain of public policy. Public authorities should create structures and services that enable parents to learn and practise good parenting skills. This would be a major step towards laying the groundwork for genuinely positive parenting.

The Council of Europe has always been a forerunner in furthering understanding of childhood and family life experiences. Based on its wide experience and fully acknowledging that there are many different ways to raise children, it has drawn up a set of general principles that underlie the concept of positive parenting as well as guidelines on how policy makers can support it. The reference document for the Council of Europe’s work in this area is Committee of Ministers Recommendation (2006)19 on policy to support positive parenting.