Draft CDDH report containing conclusions and possible proposals for action on ways to resolve the large numbers of applications arising from systemic issues identified by the Court

I. Introduction

1. The Declaration adopted at the High-level Conference on the future of the European Court, organised in 2012 by the United Kingdom Chairmanship of the Committee of Ministers at Brighton, called on the “the States Parties to the Convention to work together to find ways to resolve the large numbers of applications arising from systemic issues identified by the Court, considering the various ideas that have been put forward, including their legal, practical and financial implications, and taking into account the principle of equal treatment of all States Parties” (para 20.c).

2. The Brighton Declaration made additional references to systemic issues and repetitive applications, clarifying the position of the States Parties on the nature of the problem and the respective responsibilities of those States Parties. It states that repetitive applications arise from systemic or structural issues at the national level. It is the responsibility of a State Party, under the supervision of the Committee of Ministers, to ensure that such issues and resulting violations are resolved as part of the effective implementation of the Convention, including by the implementation of general measures. The Committee of Ministers must ... ensure that any measures taken by a State Party have resolved a violation. The Committee of Ministers should be able to take effective measures in respect of a State Party that fails to comply with its obligations under Article 46 of the Convention. The Committee of Ministers should pay particular attention to violations disclosing a systemic issue at national level, and should ensure that States Parties quickly and effectively implement pilot judgments.

3. The Committee of Ministers subsequently instructed the Steering Committee for Human Rights (CDDH) to present “conclusions up to paragraph 20.c) of the Brighton Declaration” (para 20.c) of the Brighton Declaration in December 2013.² The CDDH conferred the task on the Committee of experts on the reform of the Court (DH-GDR), where work was initiated in December 2013 in the Draft Report on the Court (GT-GDR-D).

4. Having carefully studied its terms of reference in the light of the Brighton Declaration as a whole and in particular its paragraphs 18 and 20.c), the CDDH wishes to clarify its understanding of certain essential terms. The Brighton Declaration refers to “systemic or structural issues at the national level which have already been addressed by a national court or tribunal in a judgment. The CDDH understands its terms of reference, however, to be somewhat broader than “systemic or structural issues at the national level which have already been addressed by a national court or tribunal in a judgment”, which would include both repetitive applications and underlying problems (“systemic issues”)³ that have not yet been addressed. The Court’s approach to, for example, the Burdakov case shows that it may identify systemic issues at a procedural stage before judgment. From the perspective of the Strasbourg control mechanism, however, the CDDH considers that the most serious problems relate to repetitive applications, as defined above, and will therefore give priority in this report to ways to resolve these.

5. The present report will address the following aspects:

- the nature and scale of the problem

¹ See the Brighton Declaration, paras. 18, 26 and 27.

² The original deadline of 15 October 2013, set in the decisions of the May 2012 Ministerial Session, was put back to 31 December 2013 by the Ministers’ Deputies at their meeting on 16 January 2013.

³ In paragraph 6 below, the CDDH defines the term “systemic issues” as follows: “systemic issues are those which arise from a common cause and affect a large number of States Parties”.

- general principles for resolving applications arising from systemic issues
- existing procedural tools applicable to repetitive applications
- the Court's 'special secondment procedure'
- the proposal for a 'special secondment procedure'
- supervision of execution of judgments by the Committee of Ministers
- future work on whether more effective measures are needed in respect of States that fail to implement judgments of the Court in a timely manner
- provision of Council of Europe technical assistance
- previous CDDH work on repetitive applications
- conclusions and possible proposals.

II. The nature and scale of the problem

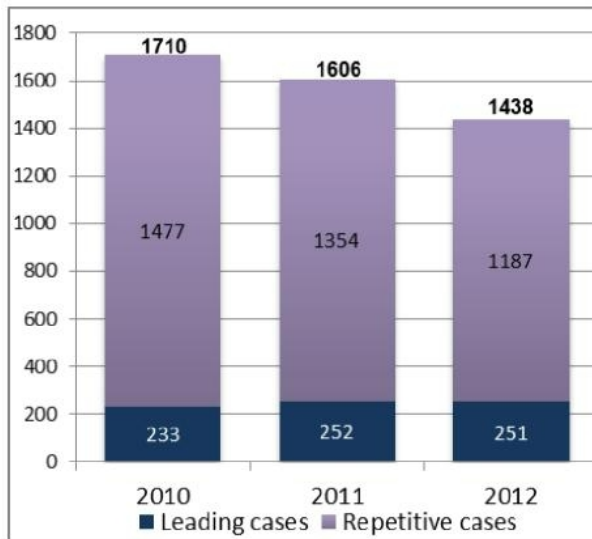

6. The 6th Annual Report of the Committee of Ministers on supervision of the execution of judgments and decisions of the Court (2012) indicates that repetitive applications mainly arise from the following categories of systemic issue: excessive length of domestic proceedings; non-enforcement of final judicial decisions; poor detention conditions; various issues concerning property rights; and problems concerning pre-trial detention/ detention on remand.⁴

7. At the first GT-GDR-D meeting, the Court's Registry of 2013, there were nearly 41,000 repetitive applications pending before the Court, a 92% increase since 2010. 64% of those cases concerned either length of proceedings or non-enforcement of final judicial decisions. 87% were brought against six of the 47 States Parties.⁵ Information provided in the 2012 Annual Report on supervision of execution sheds light on the situation as regards the number of relevant judgments delivered by the Court and the process of supervision by the Committee of Ministers of their execution by respondent States. The following two tables show the evolution over recent years in terms of leading and repetitive cases.⁶ The number of new repetitive cases in particular has decreased (along with the total number of cases, the number of new leading cases increasing from 2010 to 2011 and only marginally decreasing from 2011 to 2012). The number of repetitive cases pending before the Committee of Ministers, however, has increased, albeit at a decelerating rate (as against an accelerating rate for leading cases).

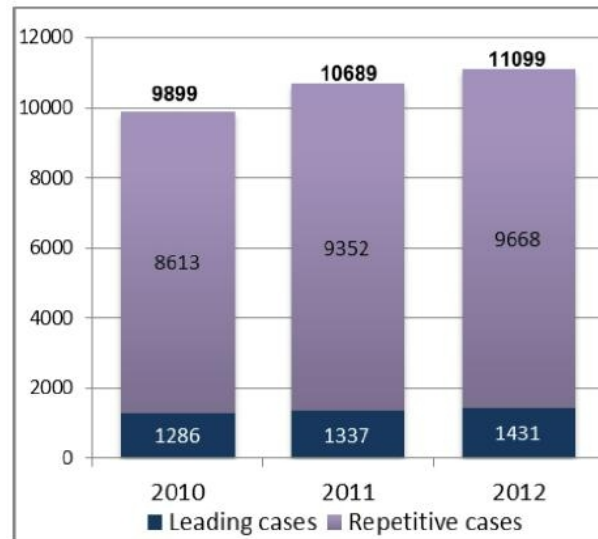

⁴ See the 2012 Annual Report on supervision of execution, in particular Appendix I, Table C2, p.48ff.

⁵ See doc. GT-GDR-D(2013)005. This figure corresponds to the number of priority category V cases – under the Court's published priority applications raising issues already dealt with in a pilot/leading case – p. 9 of the Court's Analysis of

⁶ For the purposes of the supervision of execution, 'leading cases' are those identified either by the Court or the Committee of Ministers as revealing a new structural or general problem in a respondent States and which thus require their adoption relating to a structural or general problem already raised before the Committee of Ministers in one or several leading cases.

New cases which became final between 1 January and 31 December

Pending cases at 31 December

III. General principles for resolving applications arising from systemic issues

8. The resolution of repetitive applications and systemic issues under the Convention is subject to the principle of subsidiarity, notably through the following obligations of States Parties to secure Convention rights to everyone within their jurisdiction (Article 1), to provide an effective domestic remedy for arguable complaints of violations of Convention rights (Article 13); and to abide by the final judgment of the Court in any case to which they are party (Article 46).

9. Article 35(1) of the Convention allows the Court to deal with an individual application only after all effective domestic remedies have been exhausted. Introduction of a remedy for systemic issues satisfying the requirements of Article 13 thus has the secondary effect of relieving the Court of the burden of related repetitive applications. Indeed, the Court may require an individual to exhaust an effective remedy introduced after the date on which an application was brought.⁷

10. These observations reflect the fact that the responsibility for realising the effective implementation of the Convention, underpinned by the fundamental principle of subsidiarity⁷. It has also been noted that the responsibility for ensuring the viability of the Convention mechanism⁸. This is reflected in the fact that measures taken in relation to applications to the Court arising from systemic issues require co-operation between the Court and the respondent State in question.

11. A respondent State's execution of a judgment of the Committee of Ministers (Article 46(2) of the Convention). There is generally a requirement to implement general measures in execution of a judgment (see footnote 5 above). These general measures are usually the most complex and difficult to implement and require the closest, most effective supervision by and co-operation with the Committee of Ministers in order to ensure a successful outcome. As noted in the Brighton

⁷ See, for example, the recent admissibility decision in the case of Hasan Uzun v. Turkey, App. no. 10755/13, 30 April 2013, concerning the new Turkish constitutional complaint.

⁸ See the Brighton Declaration, paras. 3 and 4; also para. 12.c), the Interlaken Declaration, para. (3) and Action Plan para. E.9, and the Izmir Declaration, para.6.

Declaration, this should be accompanied by targeted Council of Europe technical assistance programmes, upon request (see further under Section VIII below).⁹

12. Whether at the level of the Court or the Committee of Ministers, there is a need for flexibility and adaptability in addressing systemic issues, depending on their specificities and those of the respondent State in question. The need for political will at domestic level to fulfil Convention obligations remains a fundamental consideration in respect of any systemic issue a State may encounter. At the same time, there may be practical constraints posed by the reasonable limits of capacity of a respondent State; efforts should be made to identify responses to systemic issues that recognise those constraints, whilst still ensuring effective fulfilment of the Convention obligations.

IV. Existing procedural tools applicable to repetitive applications

13. The CDDH, in its recent report on the 'advancing application procedure', listed the following dealings with 'a pilot judgment procedure' (the term used in the earlier CDDH report, which would to some extent include repetitive applications arising from systemic issues):

- the pilot judgment procedure under Rule 61 of the Rules of Court (and its variants);
- judgment of principle in an individual case from a group, that principle being of general application to the group;
- joinder of applications to be decided in a single judgment;
- an invitation to the respondent State to settle a list of cases on the basis of the levels of compensation awarded in a previous judgment;
- the 'expedited Committee procedure' (see below);
- grouping of applications at the very outset of proceedings.¹¹

14. On this basis, the CDDH said that it was a "practical" problem for the Court, but in terms of resources rather than the availability of procedural responses: "similar" applications can be dealt with in a "grouped" framework... The Court has used procedural tools when the need has arisen and has tended to use these tools with greater frequency in recent years. It is too early to come to any general conclusion that they are insufficient to respond to the various challenges facing the Court arising from "similar" applications".¹²

15. In the context of the present report, which is intended to examine ways to resolve the large numbers of applications arising from systemic issues identified by the Court, it should be recalled that the CDDH had concluded that "it would be in a 'representative application procedure' and no further action be taken at inter-governmental level. This conclusion was endorsed by the Ministers their 169th meeting (30 April 2013)."¹³

⁹ See the Brighton Declaration, paras. 8 and 9.g)iii).

¹⁰ See doc. CDDH(2013)R77 Addendum IV, which defined "similar" applications as "the same violation against the same respondent State, in each of which there is an identical legal issue, based on comparable factual situations, such that resolution of a single, common question would allow determination of all similar cases": see para. 5.

¹¹ See doc. CDDH(2013)R77 Addendum IV, Section B.

¹² Ibid. paras. 22 and 24.

¹³ Ibid. para. 32.

¹⁴ See doc. CM/Del/Dec(2013)1169/4.1.

16. Whatever procedural tool the Court uses to deal with repetitive applications, the making of a unilateral declaration by the respondent State allows the Court to apply Article 37(1) of the Convention to strike the application out of its list. The procedure is set out in Rule 62A of the Rules of Court: a unilateral declaration consists of a request to the Court by the respondent State to strike an application out of the list, accompanied by a declaration clearly acknowledging that there has been a violation of the Convention in the case together with an undertaking to provide adequate redress and, as appropriate, to take necessary remedial measures, which may include both individual and general measures. Although such requests would normally follow a State's offer of a friendly settlement, Rule 62A provides an exception to this practice that justifies the Court's application of this exception to repetitive applications arising from systemic issues.

17. There have been numerous calls in recent years for greater recourse by respondent States to friendly settlements and unilateral declarations to resolve repetitive applications arising from systemic issues.¹⁵ The CDDH accompanied its own with an invitation to the Court to encourage the [respondent] State to propose from the outset, in addition to possible compensation and/or individual measures, general measures with a view to remedying a structural problem,¹⁶ where these

18. In its Preliminary Opinion in preparation for the Brighton Conference, the Court stated that its response to recommendations made at Interlaken and Izmir [it] has further developed its practice with regard to friendly settlements and unilateral declarations with the result that the number of applications disposed of in this way has increased substantially. 2010 saw a 94% rise in these decisions and 2011 a further 25%.¹⁷ In the Court's Annual Statistics 2012, [it] was noted that the number of applications for friendly settlement or a unilateral declaration increased by 57%, but there were 14% fewer unilateral declarations¹⁸.

19. It should be noted that, unlike for friendly settlements, a decision to strike out an application following a unilateral declaration is not transmitted to the Committee of Ministers for supervision of the execution of the terms of the declaration (only where the terms of a unilateral declaration are reflected in a judgment would their execution be supervised by the Committee of Ministers). After transmission of a leading judgment, the Committee of Ministers does not therefore supervise the implementation of individual measures, such as payment of compensation,¹⁹ contained in subsequent unilateral declarations; nor does it systematically receive information on subsequent new applications or strike-out decisions. It may therefore not be fully informed of relevant developments or the true scope of the unresolved systemic issue. The Court has, however, developed a practice of using letters to the Committee of Ministers to provide such information; in addition, the Registrar and the

¹⁹ In this respect, it can be noted that according to the 6th Annual Report of the Committee of Ministers on supervision of the execution of judgments and decisions of the Court, some 18% of awards of just satisfaction are paid outside the one-year time-limit (see p. 59). No statistical data is available on the number of awards of just satisfaction indicated in a unilateral declaration.

Director with responsibility for the Department for the Execution of Court Judgments now meet regularly to exchange information inter alia on these matters.²⁰

20. The CDDH notes that a careful reading of Article 27 of the Convention, alongside Article 28 and 37, suggests that the Court could confer on Single Judges decisions to strike out applications following unilateral declarations in appropriate cases.

V. The Court's envisaged 'default judgment' procedure

21. The Court, in its Preliminary Opinion in preparation for the Brighton Conference, made several references to systemic issues. An examination of such large numbers of repetitive complaints is not compatible with the functioning of an international court. The Court considers that Council of Europe member States should make more collective and individual efforts to target the structural and endemic situations which give rise to repetitive cases. The Court also gave notice that it envisaged introducing a new practice for dealing with repetitive cases:

“As things stand, the Court is not in a reasonable time. They are cases which commonly reflect a failure of the execution process to secure the adoption of effective general measures. These are cases in which the root cause has by definition already been identified in a previous leading or pilot judgment and the decisive legal issue determined. The Court envisages a practice whereby in relation to clearly repetitive cases the Registry would simply refer a list of cases directly to the Government to be settled in an appropriate way. In the absence of any justified objections from the Government, failure to provide redress within a fixed period of time would lead to a “default judgment” awarded against the applicant.”

22. On 22 June 2012, the Court Registrar, in a letter to the Deputies, wrote that:

“... the Court's Bureau has now given a mandate to the Registry to examine possible methods of dealing with repetitive cases, including introducing a default judgment procedure.”

23. At the first GT-GDR-D meeting, the Registry described subsequent developments. The Court seeks to adapt its procedure to different situations, as it did, for example, with the pilot judgment procedure: default judgment was suggested as another tool for dealing with the problem of structural or systemic violations generating large numbers of cases. The underlying principle is that the responsibility for dealing with repetitive cases has to be shifted away from the Court so that it can concentrate its efforts on the real priority cases. On this basis, the Court has developed new practices – as described in the following paragraphs – which it considers to have proved their effectiveness, although the results may be mitigated (see below). It considers that such approaches do not require amendment of the Convention, although as its practice develops and becomes established, they might be included in the Rules of Court. Whether it is helpful to label them as a sort of ‘default judgment procedure’ is open to question. It is before investigating further what a default judgment procedure properly so-called might entail. It can be noted that the Court's Committee addressed the issue.

²¹ See the Court's Preliminary Opinion, para. 35.

²² Ibid, para. 21.

24. The starting point for the new practices developed since the Brighton Conference is a p p l i c a t i o n o f n e t h i e n / p r e v e n t i v e t i m e a f t e r a f i l e i s o p e n e d there must be some action – to well-established categories of repetitive cases. An initial analysis identifies that a case falls within one such category and the relevant information is entered into the data-base (CMIS). This information can be automatically extracted to add the case to a table containing a hundred cases or more, setting out the essential data and indicating appropriate amounts of compensation. The table is communicated to the Respondent State, which may make friendly settlement proposals or unilateral declarations on the basis of the indicated amounts. If no such action has been taken by the respondent Government after a certain period of time, the Court can simply transform the grouped communication into a grouped judgment: a default judgment insofar as it is a reaction to the absence of appropriate response by the Government to a grouped communication of applications arising from a clearly identified situation of structural violation. The CDDH understands that the individual initial analysis of each case distinguishes these approaches, and would judgment procedure' me above ned in para. 1

25. In May 2012, 430 cases of non-enforcement of domestic decisions against Serbia were communicated with friendly settlement proposals, followed by a further 270. The Serbian Government did not settle the cases but did inform the Court that the Constitutional Court case-law had evolved so as to afford an effective remedy. An admissibility decision in January 2013, however, showed this to be only partly true. The Court nevertheless considers that the grouped communication did exert pressure on the national authorities to take action and there was therefore no need for a default

26. Another example is to be found in Ukrainian Ivanov-type non-enforcement cases, of which there are approximately²³ which measures to execute the Ivanov pilot judgment did not resolve the systemic issue, pending cases were unfrozen and processed using the practices developed by the Serbian team in the Registry. It was agreed with the Ukrainian Government Agent that a maximum of 250 cases would be communicated per month, with the information that in the absence of any response, judgment would be given after six months. No friendly settlement is proposed and the Government is informed that only unilateral declarations for the whole group of cases would be considered.²⁴ The Government has submitted observations in 30-35% of cases and a number of applications have been declared inadmissible. Between September 2012 and April 2013, 1,515 cases were thus communicated to the Government and 487 judgments adopted.²⁵ At the same time, the Court has indicated that awareness in Ukraine of the effectiveness of this approach has had the effect of attracting significant numbers of new applications (1100 in April 2013 alone; previously, this figure had stood at around 300-350 per month).

27. [At this stage, the CDDH has several preliminary questions concerning these approaches, by which the Court would seem to be developing elements of a possible future default judgment procedure. In particular, how is the Government Agent's of limited resources, expected to administer and analyse up to 250 applications per month? If the Court has not examined the admissibility of the applications and the respondent State does not receive the entire case file, how is it possible for the latter to contest admissibility; is it expected to complete the case-file itself? What safeguards are there for ensuring consistent application of the admissibility criteria to applications whether dealt with under these or 'standard'? The CDDH notes that the Court has indicated that in the case of the Ukrainian post-Ivanov cases, admissibility questions concerning victim status, exhaustion of domestic remedies (there are none) and the time-limit for applying (the violation is continuing) do not arise. The CDDH also considers that the Court should engage with all the States Parties in any further development called.]

²³ See Yuriy Nikolayevich Ivanov v. Ukraine, App. no. 40450/04, judgment of 15 October 2009.

²⁴ The Court has indicated a basis for calculating appropriate levels of just satisfaction in the post-Ivanov case of Kharuk v. Ukraine, App. no. 703/05 and 115 others, Committee judgment of 26 July 2012.

VI. A proposal for a 'special secondment procedure'

28. At the first GT-GDR-D meeting, the Polish expert presented secondment inspired by the fact that effective execution of a judgment very often requires not only legislative amendment or adoption of new laws but also changes in administrative practices or even of public predominant method of dealing with repetitive applications arising from systemic issues.²⁶ It should be noted that this would be entirely distinct from the current practice of secondments to the Registry intended to reinforce its capacity to process clearly inadmissible Single Judge cases.

29. The 'special secondments procedure' would

- relevant applications identified by the Court would be communicated to the respondent State in the form of a table containing basic information;
- under a special agreement between the respondent State and the Registry, national experts would be sent to Strasbourg to analyse, together with members of the Registry, the cases set out in this table and to support the Registry in examining the case files;
- a 'consolidated team' composed of supervisory would, within a predetermined, reasonably short period of time, identify a group of well-founded, admissible cases that could be 'declaration' on the basis of previous judgments;
- this group of cases would not require further examination by the Court or the respondent State's Government Agent;
- the Government Agent would submit a 'joint acknowledgement that there have been violations with an undertaking to provide adequate redress, the sums of which would be adjusted to the individual circumstances of each case;
- if the Court accepts the 'joint unilateral' out of its list by way of a joint decision containing the list of applicants and the sums to be paid to each in redress;
- for applications not be considered admissible and well-founded by the 'consolidated team', the respondent State would bear the cost of their subsequent examination.

30. It was noted that this proposal reflects the need for co-operation and burden-sharing between the Court and the respondent State.

²⁶ See doc. GT-GDR-D(2013)004.

31. The suggested advantages of such a procedure were:

- the financial and organisational burden of examining such applications could be shifted onto the State responsible for the underlying systemic issue;
- the procedure for examining repetitive applications could be significantly simplified and accelerated;
- the Court could be relieved of its workload of such cases;
- it could prevent any flow of inadmissible/ unmeritorious applications submitted in the hope that they would benefit from automatic processing of cases without proper scrutiny;
- it could amount to pressure on the State concerned to accelerate the implementation of general measures, whilst ensuring that applicants receive due examination of their cases and redress where appropriate;
- the Court's jurisdiction, including the right to refer cases to the Court, could be of value to the applicants and significance to the national judicial system;
- it could be a flexible system that could be adapted to different systemic issues and national circumstances;
- the Court's backlog of such cases could be eliminated.

32. The suggested disadvantages were:

- it would depend entirely on the willingness of respondent States;
- there may be concerns about the transparency of the process and the possibility of it appearing to compromise the Court's, giving a privileged position to officials of the respondent State;
- the Court would still be involved in the process and there may thus be no great saving of its time or resources;
- it would depend on the availability of sufficient national budgetary and human resources to send national experts to the Court and of national budgetary resources to implement the terms of the unilateral declarations;
- it may amount to differential treatment of respondent States;
- there would always be a risk of collapse in the process after initiation were there to be failure to reach agreement, which would result in wasted resources;
- there may be concerns about giving officials of the respondent State access to sensitive material contained in the application, where the applicant expected anonymity or confidentiality;
- by accelerating the treatment of applications, it could still provoke additional applications to the Court;
- it may not help to resolve the underlying problem at national level.

33. It was further noted that this proposal has some characteristics of a mediation procedure (in effect, as a variant on the friendly settlement procedure under Article 39 of the Convention) as practiced before many national courts and could perhaps be developed in that sense through greater involvement of applicants. The CDDH has not had the possibility to examine this possibility in detail.

VII. Supervision of execution of judgments by the Committee of Ministers

34. As noted in the Brighton Declaration (see Opinion (see para. 19 above), execution of judgments and its supervision by the Committee of Ministers are crucial to resolving systemic issues. The 6th Annual Report of the Committee of Ministers on supervision of the execution of judgments and decisions of the Court (2012) states that "the major criticism [are] repetitive cases and the supervision persistence of certain²⁷ it should be recalled that the principle of subsidiarity also has an application to execution of judgments, with a respondent State in principle free to choose the means for effective implementation, subject to the Committee of Ministers' supervision. That said, the general measures expected of a respondent State in response to a systemic issue, notably (although not only) when delivering pilot judgments.

35. In 2011, the Committee of Ministers established a pilot scheme in which certain cases are subject to 'enhanced supervision' in which supervised supervision and judgments otherwise disclosing major structural problems, as identified by the Court and/ or the Committee of Ministers; the classification decision is taken when the case is first presented to the Committee, which may also decide to transfer a case to enhanced supervision at a later stage. All supervision is continuous, so that the Committee should receive relevant information from the respondent State in real time, beginning with submission of an Action Plan (proposing future measures) or Action Report (suggesting the sufficiency of measures already taken) within six months of the judgment or decision becoming final. Action Plans and Reports should be promptly made public (in principle, published on the web-site), unless accompanied by a motivated request for confidentiality.

36. Cases subject to enhanced supervision are followed closely by the Committee of Ministers, which supports domestic execution processes, including through interim resolutions expressing satisfaction, encouragement or concern, and/ or making suggestions or recommendations as to appropriate measures. The Committee may also intervene in the execution process through declarations by the Chair or high-level meetings with national authorities. At the request of the national authorities or the Committee, the Secretariat may contribute through various targeted co-operation and assistance activities, which are of particular importance for cases under enhanced supervision.

37. When the respondent State considers that all necessary measures have been taken, it submits a final action report proposing closure of supervision, following which other member States, the applicant or other permitted parties have six months to submit comments or questions and the Secretariat prepares a detailed evaluation. If this evaluation is consistent with that of the respondent State, a draft final resolution is presented for adoption by the Committee of Ministers. If it is not, the Committee must consider the issues raised. Once it is satisfied that all necessary measures have been taken, the Committee adopts the final resolution closing supervision.

38. The CDDH has been given terms of reference to prepare conclusions and possible proposals for action on whether more effective measures are needed in respect of States that fail to implement judgments of the Court in a timely manner, to be fulfilled by 31 December 2013. As stated above, execution of judgments and its supervision by the Committee of Ministers are crucial to resolving systemic issues and the repetitive applications that result from them: it is clear that there is a strong connection between the present report and the forthcoming work.²⁹

²⁷ See the 6th Annual Report, p.13.

²⁸ See docs. CM/Inf/DH(2010)45 final and CM/Del/Dec(2010)1100eE.

²⁹ This is also the case as regards the work of the GT-GDR-C on the 'representative applications' in the present report, insofar as it concerns the Court's pilot scheme (see above).

VIII. Provision of Council of Europe technical assistance

39. The Brighton Declaration invited the Secretary General to propose to States Parties, through the Committee of Ministers, practical technical assistance available to each State Party on a bilateral basis, taking into account particular judgments of the Court³⁰.

40. On 5 December 2012, the Secretary General submitted to the Committee of Ministers a Preliminary Report on follow-up to the Brighton Declaration.³¹ This report notes that the needs identified in the framework of supervision of execution are, as a rule, taken into consideration when designing and implementing bilateral co-operation programmes. This is ensured through co-ordination by the Office of the Director General of Programmes when preparing country specific Action Plans, including with the Directorate of Human Rights in DG I. This Directorate includes the secretariat involved in supervision of execution and manages all bilateral, regional and multilateral co-operation projects in the field of human rights. The specific objectives and expected results of these projects are set against the evolution of the Committee of Ministers' supervision of new judgments by the Court, thus ensuring deliverables that best facilitate the execution of judgments by the beneficiary States. The secretariat involved in supervision of execution also manages projects targeting certain specific aspects. DG I is currently developing co-ordination tools to allow co-operation programmes to take the execution of judgments further into consideration.

IX. Previous CDDH work on repetitive applications

41. As part of the Interlaken process, the CDDH has previously reported on proposals for responding to the problem of repetitive applications arising from systemic issues.³² These included a range of proposals for action by various actors, both individually and in collaboration, including member States, the Committee of Ministers, the Court and others. They have not yet been the subject of specific decisions by the Committee of Ministers.

42. Given their length and detail, these proposals are not repeated here in full. Insofar as the CDDH considers that there remains scope for taking significant further action on them, however, they are recalled in the final conclusions and possible proposals at Section XII.

X. Conclusions and possible proposals

43. The CDDH proposes the following as ways and means of resolving the large numbers of applications arising from systemic issues identified by the Court:

- Member States are expected to implement fully the relevant Committee Recommendations to member States, especially, in the present context:
 - o Rec(2004)5 on the verification of the compatibility of draft laws, existing laws and administrative practice with the standards laid down in the European Convention on Human Rights, Rec(2004)6 on the improvement of domestic

- remedies and CM/Rec(2010)3 on effective remedies for excessive length of proceedings; and
- CM/Rec(2008)2 on efficient domestic capacity for rapid execution of judgments of the European Court of Human Rights;
 - [Member States are encouraged to take full account of the Guide to Good Practice in respect of domestic remedies in fulfilling their obligation under Article 13 of the Convention;]
 - Member States are encouraged to co-operate fully with the Court in pursuing appropriate procedural solutions to systemic issues and so as to relieve the Court of the burden of repetitive applications, notably through recourse to friendly settlements and unilateral declarations;
 - the Court could be invited to consider conferring on Single Judges, in accordance with Article 27 of the Convention, decisions to strike out applications following unilateral declarations in appropriate cases;
 - Member States shall fully and promptly execute individual and general measures contained in judgments of the Court, friendly settlements or unilateral declarations;
 - Member States should co-operate fully with the Committee of Ministers in its supervision of the execution of judgments and friendly settlements, including through the full and prompt provision of relevant information and respect for procedural deadlines;
 - Member States are encouraged to indicate in their Action Plans on execution of ‘leading’ judgments their subsequent repetitive applications by means of unilateral declarations;
 - the Court could be invited to provide to the Committee of Ministers full information on developments before it concerning systemic issues identified in earlier judgments, including the number and content of unilateral declarations and of new applications received;
 - Member States are encouraged to avail themselves fully of the various forms of technical assistance provided by the Council of Europe;
 - Member States are encouraged to contribute to the Human Rights Trust Fund as a source of extra-budgetary finance for targeted technical assistance programmes;
 - the Council of Europe should continue to improve the targeting of relevant technical assistance available to each State Party on a bilateral basis.

44. In view of the scale of the problem, the CDDH underlines that full, prompt and effective execution of judgments of the Court, friendly settlements or unilateral declarations and full co-operation of the respondent State with the Committee of Ministers are the most urgent measures to be implemented. In particular, the introduction by the respondent State of a carefully designed, effective domestic remedy pending before the Court and future applications.³³ Introduction of such a remedy will in many cases follow from full execution of existing Court judgments. Recent experience has shown that this response can have an extremely powerful impact on the situation. It does not, however, absolve the respondent State from resolving the underlying problem.

45. Finally, the CDDH notes that its forthcoming report containing conclusions and possible proposals for action on whether more effective measures are needed in respect of ³³ See, for example, Kaplan v. Turkey, App. no. 24240/07, judgment of 20 March 2012; Turgut v. Turkey, App. no. 4860/09, decision of 26 March 2013, in which the Court indicated that as of 31 December 2012, more than 3800 applications made to it arising from the same problem had not yet been communicated to the respondent State.

States that fail to implement judgments of the Court in a timely manner will also be relevant to the question of ways to resolve the large numbers of applications arising from systemic issues identified by the Court.
