

OTHER ACTS HAVING CHILLING EFFECTS ON MEDIA FREEDOM

This note presents a non-exhaustive selection of the case law of the European Court of Human Rights and of the other Council of Europe instruments that are relevant for the Category E of the alerts posted on the Platform called “Other acts effects on media freedom”. This category mainly refer to restrictive legislation encroaching on media freedom; censorship, interference with editorial freedom; threats to the confidentiality of journalists; unjustified or indiscriminate blocking of websites or social media platforms, hacking and surveillance or interception of communications data of journalists without due process of authorisation.

RESTRICTIVE LEGAL FRAMEWORK

Restriction imposed by domestic law on the right to impart information during election campaign

Orlovskaya Iskra v. Russia - 42911/08

Judgment 21.2.2017

The applicant published a regional newspaper whose political affiliation was specified on the front page. During the 2007 election campaign for the lower chamber of Parliament, the newspaper published a number of articles criticising a candidate in those elections. The regional electoral committee examined the articles and concluded that they contained elements of electoral campaigning which had not been paid for from the official campaign fund of any party, in breach of the relevant domestic provisions. The applicant was found guilty of an administrative offence and fined.

According to the European Court of Human Rights, the domestic regulative framework restricted the activity of the print media on the basis of a criterion that was vague and conferred a very wide discretion on public authorities that were to interpret and apply it. The public watchdog role of the press is no less pertinent at election time. That role encompasses an independent exercise of freedom of the press on the basis of free editorial choice aimed at imparting information and ideas on subjects of public interest. In particular, discussion of the candidates and their programs contribute to the public receive information and strengthened voters' ability.

---

<sup>1</sup> This information is not a legal assessment of the alerts and should not be treated or used as such

The Court noted that the French press law at that time was couched in very wide terms and conferred wide-ranging powers on the Minister of the Interior to issue administrative bans on the dissemination of publications of foreign origin or written in a foreign language. Such legislation appeared to be in direct conflict with the actual wording of Article 10 of the Convention, which provides that the rights set forth in that Article are secured “regardless of frontiers”. The fact that, on the eve of the Second World War, might have justified tight control over foreign publications, the argument that a system discriminating against publications of that sort should continue to remain in force appear currently to be untenable.

As regards the judicial review of administrative bans, the Court noted the procedures in place in France provided then insufficient guarantees against abuse. Such review was not automatic and the administrative courts only carried out a limited review. In practice, the applicant had to wait more than nine years before obtaining a final judicial decision.

Conclusion: violation of Article 10 of the Convention

Domestic legislation failing to meet the requirements of accessibility and foreseeability of law

Unifaun Theatre Productions Limited and Others v. Malta no. 37326/13

Judgment 15.5.2018

The case concerned a complaint by the applicants “Stitching”, written by Anthony Neilson, the Scottish playwright

In December 2008 the first applicant applied to the Board for Film and Stage Classification for a rating certificate ahead of a planned staging of the play, which deals with a troubled relationship between a man and a woman. However, the Board banned the play. The reasons for the decision included the play being blasphemous, showing contempt for the victims of the Auschwitz death camp, portraying dangerous sexual perversions and referring to the sexual assault of children. The domestic courts rejected constitutional appeals. In particular, the Constitutional Court found that any genuine aim the play had in portraying relationships was submerged under the instances of blasphemy, the vilification of the dignity of women and children, and the glorification of sexual perversion.

The European Court of Human Rights recalled that the expression “prescribed by law” in paragraph of Article 10 not only requires that the impugned measure should have a legal basis in domestic law, but also refers to the quality of the law in question, which should be accessible to the person concerned and foreseeable as to its effects. The law must be sufficiently precise to enable any individual – if need be with appropriate advice – to regulate his conduct. For domestic law to meet the requirements of accessibility and foreseeability it must afford legal protection against arbitrary interferences by public authorities with the rights safeguarded by the Convention. In matters affecting fundamental rights it would be contrary to the rule of law, one of the basic principles of a democratic society enshrined in the Convention, for a legal discretion granted to the executive to be expressed in terms of an unfettered power. The Court considered that the Maltese domestic law applicable in this case did not meet these requirements as it was not sufficiently precise and does not indicate with sufficient clarity the scope of the discretion conferred on the competent authorities and the manner of its exercise.

Conclusion: violation of Article 10 of the Convention

See, for other examples of case law on deficient legislation limiting media freedom,

- Bayev and Others v. Russia - 67667/09, 44092/12 and 56717/12, Judgment 20.6.2017 [Legislative prohibition on the promotion of homosexuality among minors reinforcing stigma and prejudice and encouraging homophobia]: violation
- Independent Newspapers (Ireland) Limited v. Ireland - 28199/15, Judgment 15.6.2017 [Absence of adequate and effective safeguards in legislation and practice concerning damages award in libel action: violation]
- Gawaeda v. Poland no. 26229/95, Judgment 14.3.2002 [Ambiguous legislation allowing an arbitrary refusal to register the title of a publication]: violation
- Pravoye Delo and Shtekel v. Ukraine - 33014/05, Judgment 5.5.2011 [Absence of safeguards in domestic law for journalists using publishing materials obtained from the Internet]: violation
- Cumhuriyet V a kafid Others v. Turkey - 28255/07, Judgment 8.10.2013 [Lack of procedural safeguards when issuing blocking orders against national newspaper]: violation
- Sanoma Uitgevers B.V. v. the Netherlands [GC] - 38224/03, Judgment 14.9.2010, [Deficient legislation allowing compulsory surrender of journalistic material that could have led to identification of journalistic sources]: violation

CENSORSHIP

Forcible removal of journalists from press gallery of Parliament

Selmani and Others v. the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia - 67259/14
Judgment 9.2.2017

The applicants were journalists covering a parliamentary debate when a commotion, provoked by a group of MPs, broke out, triggering the intervention of security staff. When the applicants refused to comply with an order to vacate the gallery, they were forcibly removed.

The central issue was whether the interference complained of was necessary in a democratic society. The disorder in the parliamentary chamber and the way in which the authorities handled it were matters of legitimate public interest. The media therefore had the task of imparting information on the event and the public had the right to receive such information.

The media played a crucial role in providing information on demonstrations and the containment of disorder. Any attempt to remove journalists from the scene of demonstrations had to be subject to strict scrutiny. That principle applied even more so when journalists exercised their right to impart information to the public about the behaviour of elected representatives in Parliament and about the manner in which authorities handled disorder that occurred during parliamentary sessions.

During the disturbance in the chamber, the applicants were passive bystanders who were simply doing their work and observing the events. They did not pose any threat to public safety, order in the chamber or otherwise. Their removal entailed adverse effects that instantaneously prevented them from obtaining first-hand and direct knowledge based on their personal experience of the events unfolding in Parliament. Those were important elements in the which the public should not have been deprived.

Conclusion: violation of Article 10 of the Convention

Obstacles in gathering information and courts' monopoly of information of indirect censorship

---

Társaság a Szabadságjogokért v. Hungary - 37374/05 Judgment 14.4.2009

The applicant is a non-governmental organisation which aims to promote fundamental rights as well as to strengthen civil society and the rule of law in Hungary. Given the nature of its activities involving human-rights litigation in the field of protection of freedom of information, the Court characterised the applicant as a social "watchdog", whose activities were afforded to the press. It emphasised that the State's obligation to bring down of barriers to the press exercising its right to freedom of expression on matters of public interest, especially when such barriers existed solely because of an information monopoly held by the authorities. The State had had an obligation not to impede the flow of information sought, especially where the information sought had been ready and available and had not required the collection of any data by the Government. For the Court, if public figures were allowed to censor the press and public debate in the name of their own personal rights, it would be disastrous for freedom of expression in the sphere of politics.

Therefore, in this case, the obstacles that had been created in order to hinder access to information of public interest had been capable of discouraging those working in the media or related fields from pursuing such a matter. The Court held accordingly that the applicant organisation had been prevented from exercising its role of a public watchdog, and from providing accurate and reliable information to the public.

Conclusion: violation of Article 10 of the Convention

See, for other examples of case law related to (self)censorship,

- Youth Initiative for Human Rights v. Serbia no. 48135/06, Judgment 25.6.2013 [Refusal to allow access to intelligence information despite a binding decision directing disclosure]: violation
- Shapovalov v. Ukraine, no. 45835/05, Judgment 31.10.2012 [Obstacles allegedly hindering the access to information for journalists during their coverage of elections]: no violation
- Dilipak v. Turkey - 29680/05, Judgement 15.9.2015 [Threats brandished on journalists to face criminal proceedings and harsh sentences likely to amount to self-censorship]: violation.

POLITICAL INTERFERENCE WITH THE EDITORIAL FREEDOM

Insufficient statutory guarantees for the independence of the public broadcaster

---

Manole and Others v. Moldova - 13936/02 Judgment 17.9.2009

According to the applicants, all employed by Teleradio-Moldova (TRM), the only national television and radio station in Moldova at that time, TRM was subjected to political control. This worsened after February 2001 when the Communist Party won a large majority in the Parliament. In particular, senior TRM management was replaced by those loyal to the Government and only a trusted group of journalists were used for reports of a political nature, which were edited to present the ruling party in a favourable light. Journalists were reprimanded for using expressions which reflected negatively on the Soviet period or suggested cultural and linguistic links with Romania. Interviews were cut and programmes were taken off the air for similar reasons. Journalists transgressing these policies were subjected to disciplinary measures and even interrogated by the police.

The Court first noted that the Government did not deny the specific examples cited by the applicants of TV or radio programmes that had been banned from air because of the language used or their subject-matter. Further, having accepted that TRM maintained a list of prohibited words and phrases, the Government had not provided any justification for it. In addition, given that the authorities had not monitored TRM's compliance with its obligations under Article 10 of the Convention and that opposition parties alike, the Court found the relevant data provided by non-governmental organisations significant. The Court thus concluded that in the present case the Government's actions did not favour the President and ruling Government and had provided scarce access to the air to the opposition.

The Court further found that during most of the period in question TRM had enjoyed a virtual monopoly over audiovisual broadcasting in Moldova. Consequently, it had been of vital importance for the functioning of democracy in the country that TRM transmit accurate and balanced information reflecting the full range of political opinion and debate. The State authorities were under a duty to ensure a pluralistic audiovisual service by adopting laws ensuring TRM's independence and control. However, during the period considered by the Court, from February 2001-September 2006, when one political party controlled the Parliament, Presidency and Government, domestic law did not provide a sufficient guarantee of political balance and supervisory body nor any safeguard against interference in TRM's decision-making and functioning.

Conclusion: violation of Article 10 of the Convention

Withdrawal from sale of copies of a municipally owned weekly newspaper at the request of the editor-in-chief on account of the politically sensitive content of an article

Salyiev v. Russia - 35016/03

Judgment 21.10.2010

The applicant wrote an article criticising a deal for the acquisition of shares in a local energy producing company by a group of Moscow-based firms which the editor-in-chief of a municipally-owned newspaper agreed to publish. However, a number of copies of the issue containing the article were withdrawn from the news-stands shortly after distribution and later destroyed.

From the evidence before it, the Court saw no reason to depart from the finding that the withdrawal had been on account of the politically sensitive content of an article by the editor-in-chief of a municipally-owned newspaper, which, holding the right to shape its editorial policy, is entitled to publish its newspaper.

policy to a certain extent. It appeared that the editor-in-chief's decision had been perception of the situation and the possible negative consequences of the article, without a state authority having expressed dissatisfaction with it. Nevertheless, given the fact that he was required to ensure the loyalty of his newspaper to the municipality and its policy line, his decision could be characterised as an act of policy-driven censorship. The Court was not convinced by the Government's argument that the municipality was not a State authority for the purpose of the Convention, given that under Russian law municipal authorities were treated on the same footing as federal or regional bodies for many purposes. The interference with Mr Saliyev's rights was not justified in the interests of the authority.

Domestic law entitled editors-in-chief to decide on questions relating to the distribution of a newspaper. The decision to withdraw the copies could therefore be considered as lawful. The Court was also prepared to accept that the decision pursued the "legitimate aim" of protecting the rights of others" for the purpose of Article 10, namely the newspaper company targeted by the article.

As to the question whether the withdrawal had been justified, the Court underlined that Mr Saliyev had reported on a matter relating to the management of public resources, lying at the heart of the responsibility and the right of the public to receive information. The domestic courts had not addressed the question whether he had exceeded the limits of permissible criticism or analysed the content or the form of the article at all, but had simply treated Mr Saliyev's complaint as a business matter. The Court pointed out that the relationship between a journalist and an editor-in-chief is not only or always a business relationship, as the newspaper was, according to its own charter, a municipal institution aiming to inform the public about local social, political and cultural issues. The domestic courts had therefore failed to give a justification for the withdrawal from the standpoint of Article 10. The critical views expressed in Mr Saliyev's article were moreover not challenged.

Conclusion: violation of Article 10 of the Convention

See, also, in the context of media coverage of elections, Communist Party of Russia and Others v. Russia - 29400/05, Judgment 19.6.2012 [Allegations of biased media coverage of parliamentary elections]: no violation of Article 10 of the Convention

THREATS TO THE CONFIDENTIALITY OF SOURCES

Judicial order requiring news media to disclose a leaked document liable to lead to the identification of their source

---

Financial Times Ltd and Others v. the United Kingdom - 821/03
Judgment 15.12.2009

The case concerned a complaint by the applicants – four newspapers and a news agency – that they had been ordered by the domestic courts to disclose to Interbrew, a Belgian brewing company, a confidential document about a takeover bid, document which could lead to the identification of their journalistic sources.

The Court noted that disclosure orders had a detrimental impact not only on the source, but also on the newspaper, whose reputation could be negatively affected in the eyes of future potential sources, and on members of the public, who had an interest in receiving information through anonymous sources and were also potential sources themselves. As to whether the conduct of the source could override the principle of non-disclosure, the Court explained that domestic courts should be slow to assume, in the absence of compelling evidence, that a source was clearly acting in bad faith with a harmful purpose and had disclosed intentionally falsified information.

In carrying out the requisite balancing exercise, the Court focused on the following aspects: the purpose of the leak, the authenticity of the leaked document and the interests in identifying the source, and, lastly, the effect of the disclosure order. Emphasising the chilling effect on journalists being seen to assist in the identification of anonymous sources, the Court found that Interbrew's interests in eliminating the threat of damage through future dissemination of confidential information and in obtaining damages for past breaches of confidence by bringing judicial proceedings against the source had been insufficient to outweigh the public interest in the protection of journalists' sources.

Conclusion: violation of Article 10 of the Convention

U r g e n t   s e a r c h   a t   j o u r n a l i s t ' s   h o m e   i n v o l v i n g h e r   s o u r c e s   o f   i n f o r m a t i o n

---

Nagla v. Latvia - 73469/10 Judgment 16.7.2013

The applicant worked for the national television broadcaster where she produced and hosted a weekly investigative news program "De Facto". In February 2010 she was who revealed that there were serious security flaws in a database maintained by the State Revenue Service (VID). She informed the VID of a possible security breach and then publicly announced the data leak during a broadcast of De foya police and a Taptop, an applica external hard drive, a memory card, and four flash drives were seized after a search warrant was drawn up by the investigator and authorised by a public prosecutor.

The Court noted that the seized data storage devices contained not only information capable of identifying the journalist's source of information sources of information. The search warrant was drafted in such vague terms as to allow the seizure of "any information" pertaining to the offence alle issued under the urgent procedure by an investigator faced with the task of classifying the crime allegedly committed by the source. These reasons were not, however, did not correspond to a "pressing social need".

The subject-matter on which the applicant reported and in connection with which her home was searched made a twofold contribution to a public debate: keeping the public informed about the salaries paid in the public sector at a time of economic crisis and about the database of the VID which had been discovered by her source. Although it was true that the actions of her source were subject to a pending criminal investigation, the right of journalists not to disclose their sources could not be considered a mere privilege to be granted or taken away depending on the lawfulness or unlawfulness of their sources, but was part and parcel of the right to information, to be treated with the utmost caution.

When, three months after the broadcast, the investigating authorities decided that a search of the applicant's home was necessary, they proceeded under the urgent procedure without any judicial authority having properly examined the proportionality between the public interest in the investigation and the protection of the journalist's freedom of

Although the investigation immediately post facto was provided for in the law, he failed to establish that the interests of the investigation in securing evidence were sufficient to override the public interest in the including protection of source protection and protection against the handover of the research material. The domestic court's reasoning concerning the perishable nature of evidence linked to cybercrimes in general could not be considered sufficient, given the investigating authorities' delay in carrying any indication of the impending destruction of evidence. Nor was there any suggestion that the applicant was responsible for disseminating personal data or implicated in the events other than in her capacity as a journalist; she remained "a witness

Conclusion: violation of Article 10 of the Convention

See, for more examples of case law on threats to the confidentiality of

- Becker v. Norway - 21272/12, Judgment 5.10.2017 [Journalist compelled to give evidence against source] : violation
- Voskuil v. the Netherlands - 64752/01, Judgment 22.11.2007, [Detention of a journalist with a view to compelling him to disclose his source of information]: violation
- Sanoma Uitgevers B.V. v. the Netherlands [GC] - 38224/03, Judgment 14.9.2010, [Deficient legislation providing for compulsory surrender of journalistic material that could have led to identification of journalistic sources]: violation
- Ivaschenko v. Russia no. 61064/10 [Custom authorities allowed to examine the data contained on a journalist laptop and to copy that data - Alleged deficient legislation]: pending
- Ernst and others v. Belgium, no. 33400/96, Judgment 15.7.2003 [Massive searches of journalists' places of work, homes and, in some cases, having leaked information about pending criminal cases]: violation
- Telegraaf Media Nederland Landelijke Media B.V. and Others v. the Netherlands - 39315/06, Judgment 22.11.2012 [Surveillance of journalists and order for them to surrender documents capable of identifying their sources]: violation

- Nordisk Film & TV A/S v. Denmark (dec.) - 40485/02, Decision 8.12.2005 [Television company ordered to hand over to the police unedited footage involving suspected paedophile]: inadmissible
- Ressiot and Others v. France no. 15054/07, Judgement 28.6.2012 [Searches carried out at the premises of L'Éclair and Le Point newspapers and at the homes of journalists accused of breaching the confidentiality of a judicial investigation by reproducing passages from records of transcripts of tapped telephone conversation]: violation
- Saint-Paul Luxembourg S.A. v. Luxembourg - 26419/10, Judgment 18.4.2013 [Search and seizure operation at newspaper to confirm identity of article author – Inadequate search warrant, insufficiently defined to avoid the possibility of abuse]: violation
- Goodwin v. the United Kingdom - 17488/90, Judgment 27.3.1996 [Disclosure order granted to private company requiring a journalist to disclose the identity of his source and justified by a threat of severe damage to its business and to the livelihood of its employees]: violation

ABUSIVE OR UNJUSTIFIED BLOCKING OF MEDIA-RELATED WEBSITES OR SOCIAL MEDIA PLATFORMS

Blocking without a legal basis of access to YouTube infringed the u s e right to receive and impart information

---

Cengiz and Others v. Turkey - 48226/10 and 1402/11
1 December 2015

Pursuant to a Law regulating Internet publications and combating Internet offences, the Ankara Criminal Court of First Instance ordered the blocking of access to YouTube on the ground that the website contained some ten videos which, under the legislation, were insulting to the memory of Atatürk. Arguing that this restriction interfered with their right to freedom to receive or impart information and ideas, Mr Cengiz, Mr Akdeniz and Mr Altıparmak, set aside and the blocking order lifted. They also alleged that the measure had had an impact on their professional academic activities and that there was a public interest in having access to YouTube. They further specified that six of the ten pages concerned had been deleted and that the other four could no longer be accessed from Turkey. The Ankara Criminal Court of First Instance rejected their application on the ground that the blocking order had been imposed in accordance with the law and that the applicants did not have standing to challenge such decisions. It observed that the videos in question could no longer be accessed from Turkey but had could therefore still be accessed by users worldwide.

Noting that the platform permitted the emergence of citizen journalism which could impart political information not conveyed by traditional media, the Court accepted that in the present case YouTube had been an important means by which Mr Cengiz, Mr Akdeniz and Mr Altıparmak could exercise their right to receive and impart information or ideas and that they could legitimately claim to have been affected by the blocking order even though they had not been directly targeted by it.

The Court went on to observe that the blocking order had been imposed under section 8(1) of Law no. 5651, which did not authorise the blocking of access to an entire Internet site on account of one of its contents. Under section 8(1), a blocking order could only be imposed on a specific publication where there were grounds for suspecting an offence. It therefore emerged that in the present case there had been no legislative provision allowing the Ankara Criminal Court of First Instance to impose a blanket blocking order on access to YouTube. The Court accordingly concluded that the interference had not satisfied the condition of lawfulness required by the Convention and that Mr Cengiz, Mr Akdeniz and Mr Altıparmak had not enjoyed a sufficient degree of

Conclusion: violation of Article 10 of the Convention

Interim court order incidentally blocking access to host and third-party websites in addition to website concerned by proceedings

---

A h m e t Y ı l d ı r - ~~3111/10~~ v . T u r k e y Judgment 18.12.2012

Following the blocking of another website as a preventive measure, a domestic court had subsequently, further to a request by the Telecommunications Directorate, ordered the blocking of all access to Google Sites, which also hosted the applicant's site. This was in violation of the applicant's right to freedom of expression.

The Court noted that the blocking of the offending site had a basis in law but it was clear that neither the applicant's site nor Google Sites fell within the scope of the law. There was no reason to suspect that their content might be illegal. No judicial proceedings had been brought against either of them. Furthermore, although Google Sites was held responsible for the content of a site it hosted, the law made no provision for the wholesale blocking of access to the service. Nor was there any indication that Google Sites had been informed that it was hosting illegal content or that it had refused to comply with an interim measure concerning a site that was the subject of pending criminal proceedings. Furthermore, the law had conferred extensive powers on an administrative body, the Telecommunications Directorate, in implementing a blocking order since it had been able to request an extension of the scope of the order even though no proceedings had been brought in respect of the site or domain concerned and no real need for wholesale blocking had been established.

Such prior restraints were not, in principle, incompatible with the Convention, but they had to be part of a legal framework ensuring both tight control over the scope of bans and effective judicial review to prevent possible abuses. However, in ordering the blocking of all access to Google Sites, the Criminal Court of First Instance had simply referred to the law as the only possible way of blocking the offending site, without ascertaining whether a less severe measure could be taken. In addition, there was no indication that the judges considering his application had sought to weigh up the various interests at stake. This shortcoming was merely a consequence of the wording of the law itself, which did not lay down any obligation for the domestic courts to examine whether the wholesale blocking of Google Sites was necessary, having regard to the criteria established and applied by the Court under Article 10 of the Convention.

Such wholesale blocking had rendered large amounts of information inaccessible, thus substantially restricting the rights of Internet users and having a significant collateral effect. The interference had therefore not been foreseeable and had not afforded the applicant the degree of protection to which he was entitled by the rule of law in a democratic society. The measure in issue had had arbitrary effects and could not be said to have been designed solely to block access to the offending site. Furthermore, the judicial-review procedures concerning the blocking of Internet sites were insufficient to meet the criteria for avoiding abuses; domestic law did not provide for any safeguards to ensure that a blocking order concerning a specified site was not used as a means of blocking access in general.

Conclusion: violation of Article 10 of the Convention

See also, for other examples,

- Ashby Donald and others v. France, no 36769/08, § 39, Judgment 10.01.2013 [Conviction of photographers for copyright infringement through publication on the Internet of photographs of fashion show]: no violation
- Akdeniz v. Turkey no. 20877/10, Decision 11.3.2014 [Measure blocking access to the websites “myspace.com” and “last.fm” disseminating musical works in breach of copyright]: inadmissible

Other relevant Council of Europe tools

Protection of journalism and safety of journalists

- Recommendation of the Committee of Ministers to member States on the protection of journalism and safety of journalists and other media actors adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 13 April 2016 at the 1253rd meeting of the Ministers' Deputies

Protection of journalistic sources

- Recommendation No. R \(2000\) 7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the right of journalists not to disclose their sources of information \(Adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 8 March 2000 at the 701st meeting of the Ministers' Deputies\)
- Recommendation 1950 \(2011\) of the Parliamentary Assembly on the protection of journalists' sources
- Declaration of the Committee of Ministers on the protection of journalism and safety of journalists and other media actors, adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 30 April 2014 at the 1198th meeting of the Ministers' Deputies
- Guidelines of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on protecting freedom of expression and information in times of crisis, adopted on 26 September 2007
- Declaration by the Committee of Ministers on the protection and promotion of investigative journalism, adopted on 26 September 2007

On the decriminalisation of defamation

- Resolution 1577 (2007) and Recommendation 1814 (2007) of the Parliamentary Assembly on the decriminalisation of defamation
- Doc. 11305 Report 2007 of the Committee on Culture, Science, Education and Media of the Parliamentary Assembly: Towards decriminalisation of defamation

Media and terrorism

- Declaration on freedom of expression and information in the media in the context of the fight against terrorism, adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 2 March 2005
- Recommendation 1706 \(2005\) of the Parliamentary Assembly on 'Media and terrorism' by "

Protection of whistleblowers

- Recommendation 2073 \(2015\) of the Parliamentary Assembly on 'Improving the protection of whistle-blowers', 23 June 2015
- Resolution 1729 \(2010\) of the Parliamentary Assembly and Doc. 12006 Report 2009 \(P. OMTZIGT\) on the protection of whistle-blowers

Internet and online media

- Recommendation CM/Rec\(2011\)7 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on a new notion of media, adopted on 21 September 2011
- Resolution 1877 \(2012\) and Recommendation 1998 \(2012\) of the Parliamentary Assembly on The protection of freedom of expression and information on the Internet and online media, 25 April 2012
- Report Doc. 12874 and addendum \(2012\) on The protection of freedom of expression and information on the Internet and online media, presented to the Committee on Culture, Science, Education and Media of the Parliamentary Assembly, 12 April 2012
- The Commissioner - CommDH/IssuePaper(2014)108 December The rule of law on the Internet and in the wider digital world. Issue Paper published by the Council of Europe Commissioner for Human

Secret surveillance/Mass surveillance : see specific Thematic factsheet.