Non-State Stakeholder Engagement in the UN Process to Develop a Convention on Cybercrime

Isabella Wilkinson (Chatham House)

- Diverse non-state stakeholders – especially civil society and underrepresented groups – should have meaningful opportunities to engage with cybercrime policymaking at the UN.

- Inclusive, effective cybercrime policymaking relies on the engagement, knowledge and networks of non-state actors.

- Looking ahead to the UN cybercrime process, there are two main channels for non-state involvement (summary).

- Policymakers and state representatives can support the engagement of civil society, the technical community, private sector and academia in a number of ways.

- Throughout the UN negotiations, Chatham House is supporting inclusive and effective cybercrime policymaking through training, regional consultations, Track 1.5 meetings and more.
