

139. Today rules on parliamentary immunity for MPs are to be found in various forms in the parliaments of all the member states of the Council of Europe, usually regulated in the constitutions themselves. Such rules may serve both as collective protection of parliament as an institution (against the executive) and as protection of the individual MPs against both the executive and the parliamentary majority.